I want now to come to the 30th. You first charged him with violating the orders of the 30th. You said he was too long getting there. Now Fitz-John Porter moved with alacrity as soon as he got the order. The enemy was massing his forces. Fitz-John Porter knew they were being massed. He knew it all the time, and just so soon as he found that our army was massed he moved right along into the fight. Who can say he did not do his full duty? The gallant men who fought that day in the Union army and in the confederate army all agree he did his duty bravely and well. He led his men right into the fight. He encouraged them in the front of the enemy. He and they stood there as long as any one could stand. His men were covered with wounds and blood; they did all men could do. Every confederate who was there will say they did their duty, and did it nobly. Fitz-John Porter's corps made a grand stand, and by that stand helped to save Washington city from falling into the hands of the enemy.

Yet, sir, when the confederates who sought to capture Washington city are brought back and forgiven for the past; when they are restored, and it is considered all right and proper; while all this is done, we are told that Fitz-John Porter, a gallant and brave officer, who faithfully did his duty, to whom a grievous injustice has been done, shall not now, when it has been discovered, be restored to his rights.

He did his whole duty, and that is unquestioned and unchallenged by any one, before that memorable battle, and that fact may be brought up as evidence of his bravery and gallantry. Why, sir, it was never doubted. It could not be doubted; and yet you tell me, after the lapse of twenty-odd years, that that unjust sentence is still to be permitted to stand against him, and that, too, in the face of testimony which destroys the last vestige of ground for a charge against him.

But I wanted to call the attention of the committee, and particularly my friends from Indiana and Tennessee, to a few facts that exist. There is, Mr. Chairman, a kind of evidence that is considered most powerful and conclusive. I say that the kind of evidence that convicted Fitz-John Porter would not be conclusive in any civil court, and that no man could be convicted upon the testimony of interested witnesses telling contrary stories while trying to shield themselves. But there is a kind of testimony that I want gentlemen to stop and look at. It is the testimony that is called in the courts the testimony of experts; the testimony of men who understand thoroughly the subjects upon which they are called to testify, and who are capable of forming conclusions upon it. I want now to examine the testimony of a few experts and their construction of certain facts in order to show that Fitz-John Porter was not mistaken about the position of the enemy at any time during the battle or at any time while his command was in front of or near the enemy on that memorable occasion. I refer to the testimony of experts in military matters. The first witness I will call, and I suppose none of those distinguished gentlemen on my right here will say that General Grant was not an expert in military affairs—the first witness is General Grant himself.

Mr. Chairman, he carefully examined all of the testimony, both of Union and confederates, all of the testimony that was given before the court-martial, and weighed it all carefully, coolly, and deliberately, and went before the country after that examination in two letters, in which he says that the conviction of Fitz-John Porter was a shame, and that he proposed to stand by him while he lived; and, Mr. Chairman, he did stand by him while he lived.

There is the testimony of a man who knew as much about military affairs as any man and I say it without any fear of contradiction, for I think, like Lee, he was superior to Pope as a military man, greatly superior in military power and knowledge; and he says that Fitz-John Porter was right and that his treatment was unjust. I ask if it would not take a great deal of testimony in a civil court to overcome the testimony of an expert like General Grant on such a question?

And, sir, we have not only his testimony, but we have the testimony of all the board of officers who tried him. They got the light that comes from heaven, the light that has come everywhere, and the country is enlightened, history is changed, and opinions are modified in relation to this matter by the light which has been let in upon it. That military board with all the light before it said he did his duty; that his conduct was most wise, most sagacious, most true to his country, and most subordinate; that he was a gallant fighter, and they say he was condemned for fighting his own fight.

But, says the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK]: "Oh, very well, we know all that; but we can not give full credit to General Grant." Why will you not give him full credit? Do you deny that he is the greatest military officer of his age? Will anybody deny that? If you do, then of course you can not give him credit. But you say when he got old his heart was softened and that his brain was softened. Do you believe it?

Mr. HOUK. Does the gentleman desire an answer?

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, sir. The gentleman is in a bad way because of his argument, and I want to give him an opportunity to set himself right.

Mr. HOUK. My argument stands before the House and the country; but, in the language of the gentleman himself, when age advances the heart melts and overflows. General Grant's kindness of heart prompted his great mind.

Mr. WOLFORD. The gentleman said that as age crept on him his brain softened——

Mr. HOUK. No, sir; nothing of the kind.

Mr. WOLFORD. That his heart became tender, and that he took a different view of the case than he would have taken some years back. I ask, do you believe it? Is there a man on this floor who believes that General Grant changed his view on any other ground than because he had examined more carefully, more thoroughly the testimony in the case? And yet gentlemen want to tell us now that his brain softened, that his judgment gave way, and that his feelings got the better of his judgment. I do not believe it.

But, sir, General Grant says Porter did his duty and his whole duty; and he said it deliberately. The military commission, which was composed of able, competent men—men who thought him guilty, men of capacity and character, like Schofield, Terry, Getty—say, when they had given an examination, a full examination, of all the testimony, that he had been dealt with unjustly. I do not know why the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Tennessee take the positions they do under these circumstances. History says they were all great and good men; and yet upon an examination—and I bring them up as experts, as men who understand exactly what the thing is—these men testify as experts that injustice was done to Porter. I could go on and mention name after name of great and gallant men whose minds were cleared of prejudice against Porter by examining that testimony. You need not tell me that Mr. Lincoln's memory is assailed.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, if the same facts had been presented to Mr. Lincoln that he would have acted in a different manner than General Grant did. I believe he would have expressed the same opinion and taken the same ground. But he never examined the testimony taken by the court, but General Grant did. Fitz-John Porter importuned General Grant to examine it, and when he examined it it was a source of regret to General Grant that he had not examined it sooner, so that justice might have been done, while he had the power as President of the United States, to Fitz-John Porter.

But again, the President of the United States, Mr. Hayes, examined the case, and when he saw the evidence produced before the examining board and the court-martial, when he had before him every word of it, when he saw all that, he pardons Fitz-John Porter, goes as far as he can go, and says it is right he should be relieved of his disabilities.

Why should my Republican friends be so easily scared about the memory of Lincoln and the memory of Garfield? They say the court-martial was composed of good and true men. I am not here to say a word against that proposition. The men composing it, so far as I know, were good and brave men. And if Garfield was here would not his heart soften after this lapse of time? And if Lincoln were here would not his heart soften when he saw the injustice that had been done to a great and true and good and gallant man who had carried the flag of his country over many a battlefield? Every man's heart ought to soften in looking at this case and all ought to be willing to do this man justice.

I say to gentlemen on the other side you can not dodge this matter; you can not dodge the force of testimony; you can not dodge the power of truth. You want to tell me that we are hemmed in by the verdict of the court-martial; that we can not admit new light; that we must remain in the dark; that we can not go beyond the verdict of the court-martial; that no power on earth can redeem a poor soul to which a court-martial has done injustice, but that it must ever remain to be treated with contempt.

I admire the military record of Fitz-John Porter, and hold it up before the country as one which, up to Bull Run, was admitted even by his enemies to be spotless, and that he was brave and good and true and skillful. But I admire more than that in him; for he is a model hero. When he had been condemned unjustly he said, "You have condemned me contrary to the truth of the case; the facts are as I have stated them to you;" and from that day to this he has never ceased to claim vindication, while the withering blasts have been upon him; while the disgrace of being cashiered has hung about him like death; while he feels it, as every sensitive soldier must feel it, for there is nothing a true soldier feels more keenly than the fact that a good name is better than great riches—that his honor is better than his life. I have never seen Fitz-John Porter, but I have read his history, and I say there is no soldier that ever could have fought as Fitz-John Porter fought and not rather have died than have had that unjust verdict found against him. He comes and asks to have it reversed. He asks Lincoln, he asks Grant, he asks Hayes, he asks everybody to give him a chance to vindicate his character. And I ask you to consider what his character was. You have a low estimate of the character of an officer if you do not feel that he would prefer anything on earth to disgrace and dishonor and scorn.

I do not appeal to your sympathies, lest it should be said of you, as of General Grant, that he was a little tender-hearted; lest it should be said of you that it indicated a softening of your brains, as the gentleman said about General Grant. But if you pass this bill you do a noble thing, which vindicates your manhood and the feelings of your own great hearts.

It has been said upon the other side, "Oh, the Democrats are united about this." Great God! how could the Democrats be anything but united on such a proposition? When such a just cause as this comes before the Democrats, and they see all the light, if any of them denied justice I would be for turning such a man out of the Democratic church. That is the reason they are united; it is the justice of this case which unites them. And can you gentlemen of the Republican party be lashed and whipped into being united on the other side because the Democrats are united in the cause of justice? This can not be done; there are too many gallant men in your party who are determined to do right and to vindicate Fitz-John Porter, even if it be late, and give him what he desires.

What are you asked to do? You are simply asked to restore him to his rank. We have more expert testimony. We have the President of the United States, we have not only the finding of the examining board, but we have the view of General Grant, and we have the action of President Hayes, and we have pretty nearly all the journals of the United States willing to vindicate Fitz-John Porter because of the light that has flashed all over the country. The truth of Heaven about this case is now known to every man who wants to investigate it. The facts are now known to all the people, high and low, and three-fourths in their hearts vindicate Fitz-John Porter.

But I want to go a little further. A bill similar to this was pending before this House and the Senate in the last Congress and gentlemen made angry speeches. Some of the distinguished gentlemen here even undertook to take the ground that they were not opposed to Union men voting upon it, but they said that a man who had been in the confederate army ought not to vote. I had to answer a gentleman from Michigan—not my distinguished friend now before me [Mr. CUTCHEON]—on that proposition in the last Congress. I remind you that the Congress of the United States with all the light before them, not, however, as much light then as there is now, for there have been recent publications that group the facts and bring them in a strong light—the Congress of the United States, upon a fair and deliberate vote, passed that bill, one-third of the Republican party against the party lash coming up and voting for it, as did pretty nearly all the Democrats. Do you say this is no vindication?

And when the President of the United States, Mr. Arthur, upon a quibble which no man——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] has expired.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word before the gentleman from Kentucky takes his seat.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] be extended ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] be extended for ten minutes. If there is no objection it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, I am wholly indifferent so far as regards those who heard what I said here the other day——

Mr. WOLFORD (interposing). The soldiers of this country will never be indifferent to your remarks, sir, which would place them in a worse position than citizens.

Mr. HOUK. One moment. I am perfectly willing that the soldiers shall know everything that I have said, but I am unwilling that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] shall stand up here and say five or six or seven times that I have made any allusion to General Grant, either directly or indirectly, that can be tortured, twisted, or construed into an intimation that he had softening of the brain or into any other unkind remark about him.

Mr. WOLFORD. Oh, everybody knows what you said. I advised you to keep it out of your printed speech, and, for your honor, I now advise you to strike it out of your speech. [Laughter.] Everybody knows what you said, and I do not intend to yield the floor for you to get up now and make another speech. You spoke here the whole day and you said just what we on our side wanted you to say, for nobody could hear your speech and not believe that Fitz-John Porter ought to be vindicated.

Mr. HOUK. There is no doubt that he needs vindication, but he will never get it in the hearts of the people.

Mr. WOLFORD. The hearts of the people are away in advance of you, sir, as they were when you were considering whether you would forgive the rebels or not. The hearts of the people are ten years in advance of you, and they have decided that Fitz-John Porter ought to be relieved. Oh, sir, it will be like the voice of salvation to the people when they hear that that long injustice has been righted by this great Congress of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word about some other things. There is one argument that I want to pay some attention to. It was hinted at by my friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], and I give that gentleman credit for making a manly speech, especially that part of it in which he said that Fitz-John Porter was not a traitor; and I give my friend from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] credit for saying the same thing. But, sir, if Porter had obeyed the order that General Pope gave him, the blood of his men would have been upon his head. Do you say he ought to have obeyed that order without regard to the lives of his men? Do you tell me that an officer should kill his men just for fun; that Porter should have done it because a general who did not know where his own command was or where the enemy was commanded him to kill them?

Sir, with Lee and Longstreet and Jackson there, with their forces massed and ours scattered, there never was a time in that battle when our soldiers could have whipped. They did their best. They did it nobly and grandly, and they should be honored for it, and Fitz-John Porter ought to be honored for the noble part he took in that fight.

But I want to say a word about an argument that is secretly handed around among our friends who want to find an excuse for voting against Porter—and certainly no man will vote against him unless he can find an excuse. The case is too straight for that. I am not going to say anything more about the position of the armies in that engagement. I wish I had a day to go into the whole matter; but I am to be followed by abler men than I am, men that were there, on both sides, and who will tell this House all about it. I want to call attention now to this argument about the necessity of strict discipline.

Sir, the rules and regulations of the Army were framed for the discipline of the Army, but they were never intended to reach the high and lofty dignity of a court of enlightened jurisprudence. When Fitz-John Porter was condemned, it was done in the interest of "discipline." It was thought that if somebody in the Union Army was not condemned by court-martial the rebels would carry everything, and so Fitz-John Porter was made the victim. Gentlemen, I would not give a fig for the discipline that rests upon fear. Any man in the Union Army or in the confederate army, or in any other army, that was held to his duty only by fear was no benefit to that army and the army would have been better by getting rid of him as quickly as possible. I would not undertake to control a soldier by fear. I would appeal to his love of country. I would appeal to his just pride. I would appeal to his love of fame. I would invite our soldiers and our officers to aim at a higher standard than any which is influenced by fear. I would say to them, "Your country demands it; the good of mankind demands it." That is the ground upon which I would appeal to them.

When he was fighting that gallant fight do you tell me he was not Pope's friend, though he loved his country? You can not deny that he loved his country with his whole soul. You can not deny that he loved McClellan. Well, I loved McClellan too. I love him yet, although he is dead. And, in my opinion, it was only to keep him from being President that he was removed. Yes, Porter loved McClellan, and he loved his country; but it is said he did not love Pope. The gentleman from Indiana said that Porter "wished he were well out" of the affair. Well, I ask any gentleman—I ask the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN], now before me—whether he would not wish himself "well out" when he had not confidence in his commander, a commander who, as it was afterward shown, was not competent? Would you not wish you and your men were "well out of it?" Such a wish would only show a man to be a true soldier; that he loved his men. But, it is said, he not only "wished himself out of it," but wished "Little Mac." was there to operate with him. If such had been the case, it would have been known where the enemy was and how he was to be met.

On this question of discipline it has been said that the utility of that court-martial was to scare somebody; to make somebody feel that he must certainly be cashiered if he did not whip the rebels the next time he met them. Why, sir, you can not say that any of our distinguished officers were scared by such a thing. I admit that there are sometimes men whom nothing but the lash will scare, who are callous to every consideration of honor and manhood. But if there were such a man in the Army, do you suppose you could by scaring him lift him up to the point of being any good to the service?

As to the power of Congress, I say we have the power to relieve Fitz-John Porter and put him back where he stood. Both Houses at the ast session said he ought to be relieved; and when the President vetoed that bill, over two-thirds of this House came up and again said he ought to be relieved. And three-fourths of all the intelligent citizens of America say to-day he ought to be relieved. You may now vote to keep that withering blight upon him until he dies—vote that his children are forever to be disgraced; but if you do that, then in the sight of Heaven, in the sight of all good and true men, in the sight of all true military men, in the sight of all philanthropists, in the sight of the wise and great and good of all times, you will have cast a vote that they will repudiate.

Mr. NEGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have a profound respect for the opinion of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, and as well a high admiration for his patriotism. To the gallant services of himself and other Union men in Kentucky is due the fact that the eastern portion of that State was not severed from the Union and turned over to the confederacy in the early part of the war; but I differ widely from the gentleman in his interpretation of the facts, also his conclusions.

Any one who will calmly, in a cool hour of reflection, study the evidence and consider the enviable reputation of the officers who composed the jury that tried Fitz-John Porter will agree with me that if ever an officer was guilty of insubordination, cruel and vicious insubordination, it was Fitz-John Porter. But I did not rise to traverse the road which has been so well beaten in argument by others who have made the facts in this case a painstaking study. I desire, however, to open another page in the personal history of General Porter in an equally critical period in the early days of the rebellion, when he exhibited his private jealousies and professional pedantry to the injury of our cause almost as conspicuously as he did under General Pope.

When the command of General Patterson was stationed at Martinsburg, on the south side of the Potomac, and every general officer or commander of a brigade was impatient to advance upon the enemy at Winchester or to flank that position and cut the communications between Beauregard and Johnston, Fitz-John Porter privately advised Patterson against it; and when the notable council of war was held on the morning of the 9th of July at Martinsburg, where the policy of a forward movement and the direction it should take was discussed in all its bearings, and it was advised by each of the commanding officers present but one that the position we held was a weak and untenable one and would be void of advantageous results if we remained, also that it was vitally important that we should change and shorten the line leading to our base of supplies, thereby turning Johnston's position at Winchester and threatening his railway communications, thus compelling him to either give battle outside of his intrenchments or retreat on Manassas, allowing Patterson's column to co-operate with McDowell or relieve his reserves without fear of exposing his lines of communication. In fact General Patterson occupied the pivotal position between the contending armies.

In case Johnston had determined to hold Winchester, as we knew he was desirous of doing, he would not care to weaken his force to an extent sufficient to materially aid Beauregard. But what was the sequence? It was determined at this meeting of officers to occupy Charlestown at once, and operate in the direction of Berryville. Orders were issued to me to move with my command as soon as my transportation and supplies could be supplied. At this point occurs my knowledge of Fitz-John Porter's timidity and opposition. A general officer, who shall be nameless, because his lips are silent in death, said to me, "You need not be in a hurry to move your command, for Major Porter is opposed to it, and will advise Patterson against it." And so it happened that after I had my whole command and transportation in line ready to march orders came from "headquarters" directing that I should return to camp, and thereby losing the only opportunity afforded General Patterson to accomplish a strategic movement.

On the 16th of July, five days later, General Patterson's entire command marched over the very route condemned at the council of war on the 9th, and encamped for the night at Bunker's Hill. No demonstration in force against the enemy was attempted, and really no effort was made to feel his position. I rode myself, attended by an orderly, nearly a mile in front of our lines. We then, without seeming purpose, turned our backs on the enemy and marched to Charleston, where, according to the confederate reports, "Patterson had moved 20 miles away, and was powerless to inflict any injury upon Johnston," leaving him to withdraw his forces at pleasure. I was told at the time and believe that Porter inspired this fatal blunder.

General Patterson was a gallant and efficient officer, and I willingly pay tribute to his honor, to his courage, and to his distinguished services in Mexico. I witnessed instances of his valor and skillful generalship near Cerro Gordo and other fields in Mexico, and I know that he was patriotic, honorable, and trustworthy; but he was embarrased and confused by conflicting orders and the persistent and timid advice of his chief of staff. He took the blame upon himself and sheltered the culpable.

While it is true that the term of service of the men was drawing to a close, they were eager to meet the enemy, but were disheartened by tardy movements and fruitless endeavors. Even after Patterson's army had reached Charlestown he might have struck the enemy a decisive blow, or compelled Johnston to delay sending re-enforcements to Beauregard, or captured the six thousand men he left in Winchester. When Beauregard, at a critical moment during the engagement at Bull Run, prayed for a few more fresh regiments, Colonel Smith, with his battalion, might have said, "Here I am, General Beauregard, by the grace of Fitz-John Porter;" and you all know that this timely arrival of Smith's command at 3 p. m., after a journey of two days from Winchester, overwhelmed the already weakened forces of McDowell and turned the tide of battle in favor of the confederates.

Far be it from me to tarnish the fair fame of any soldier, much less to deny justice to an officer who seeks his own vindication, but we are all aware that the vanity, professional pride, and envious purposes of subordinate commanders not only turned many a victory into defeat, but wantonly sacrified the lives of thousands. The flippant vanity and tardy movement of a subordinate officer in General Rosecrans's command plucked the laurels of fame from "Old Rosy's" brow and inflicted disaster upon his army. There are many other well-known instances, but I need not recall them to emphasize my argument; but if Congress deems it to be its duty, after these years of patient suffering, to remove this stigma of disgrace from deserving officers, then commence with far more meritorious cases than that of Porter.

Take the hero of Iuka, the invincible commander of the Union force at the battle of Stone River, the masterly strategist of the campaign of Tullahoma, where, but for the bravery and splendid skill of a confederate officer, now a member upon this floor, Bragg's army would have been cut in two and destroyed in detail. For twenty-odd years the iron has been left to burn in the soul of "Old Rosy."

Gentlemen, let us be candid and honest with ourselves. If you will quiet the rage of party in this Chamber and deal with the facts as they appear of record, I do not believe 50 votes would be given in favor of the restoration of Fitz-John Porter. In want of a more forcible argument, reference has been repeatedly made to the favorable opinion expressed by General Grant. I bow in reverence to the wisdom and to the immaculate honesty of the great hero of the American war, but we know his goodness of heart, and that his sympathy for a comrade was as tender as a woman's. It was this humane and considerate desire of his nature that caused his fame to fill the entire horizon of the world's admiration for him both as a man and as a soldier. That his opinion was based upon an error as to all the facts is evidenced by his qualification in regard to the supposed battle on the 29th. I view his opinion as the outcome of his generosity rather than a correct summing up of the historical records bearing on this engagement.

Mr. Chairman, I have already spoken longer than I had intended. It was my purpose to simply state the reasons why I shall vote against the pending bill, and leave the constitutional questions, with the résumé of the trial, to the able gentlemen who will speak on this occasion.

I yield twelve minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. FULLER], and reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, in the few moments allotted me I can only briefly touch upon the questions involved in this measure. I have examined quite carefully the facts in this case, and the more I have investigated the more I am convinced that from the time General Fitz-John Porter, on the 23d of August, 1862, was ordered to report to General Pope for duty, by direction of General Halleck, he was not in harmony with his commanding general; that he was guilty of conduct unbecoming an officer; that he was not a true soldier; that during the operations at Manassas he repeatedly refused and neglected to obey his commander-in-chief, and that to his course can be traced the direful results to the Union arms on that bloody field.

It is a grave experiment to open up and review the action of a court made twenty-three years ago, who acted upon the case when the facts and circumstances were fresh in the minds of witnesses. A court composed of such men as Major-Generals Hunter and Hitchcock, Brigadier-Generals King, Prentiss, Ricketts, Casey, Garfield, Buford, Slough, and Judge-Advocate-General Holt; a court made up in the main of old and experienced officers of the regular Army, who had the confidence of their brother comrades in arms and the people of the country! [Applause.]

In brief, what are the charges? First: General Pope ordered General Porter to march from Warrenton at one o'clock on the night of the 27th of August, 1862, so as to be at Bristoe Station by daylight on the morning of the 28th, to assist General Hooker against Jackson. General Porter, instead of reaching Bristoe at daylight, arrived there at 10.30 in the morning, six hours after daylight.

General Porter files a special plea. He admits that he did not obey the order, but puts in a plea of confession and avoidance. He says "that his men were tired, the night was too dark to march, and that there was a wagon-train on the road toward Bristoe." Such excuses would never have made Ethan Allen the hero of Ticonderoga or have caused Stony Point to be stormed by General Wayne. The testimony shows that General Porter's command had only marched a few miles that day, no more than was needed for good health. It may have been too dark for General Porter to advance forward and assist General Hooker in an important movement, but it was not too dark for Generals Longstreet, Stuart, Hill, Ewell, and Jackson to move their commands that night as directed in order to be in a favorable position at early dawn. This plea will never receive the indorsement of an unprejudiced jury.

The second order which General Porter disobeyed is the one known as the joint order of the 29th of August to McDowell and Porter. General Jackson had come to a stand at Groveton. Our forces opposed to him had been severely dealt with and were calling for re-enforcements. General Pope had replied that McDowell and Porter were en route from Manassas. On the morning of the 29th of August General Pope had sent the following order:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, Va., August 29, 1862.

Push forward with your corps and King's division, which you will take with you, upon Gainesville. I will follow the enemy down the Warrenton pike. Be expeditious or we shall lose much.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

To Maj. Gen. FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

The Porter column had halted near Dawkin's branch, between 4 and 5 miles from Manassas, in direction of Gainesville. The testimony shows that this was between 10 and 11 o'clock a. m. The joint order to McDowell and Porter had been received before this. Porter had some ten thousand fresh troops in plain sight of a battle as early as 10 o'clock in the morning, and there he stopped, notwithstanding he was marching in pursuance of an order that said "push forward with your corps." He was in hearing of the battle, and yet he remains there until 6.30 in the evening. I am afraid that General Porter's hatred of General Pope was greater than his love of country. The next order disobeyed was the one known as the 4.30 order. General Porter should have been in the battle by noon, but he failed to put in an appearance. A peremptory order was sent to him at 4.30 p. m. "to push forward into action" at once on the "enemy's flank, and if possible on his rear." Did Porter do it? There is some conflict in testimony as to the time this order was received. It certainly was before 6 o'clock p. m. on a bright afternoon in August. He says first it was too late in the day to obey the order, but he negatives that by again saying that Longstreet was on his front and that he could not obey.

These two excuses do not go together. Porter did order General Morell to attack, and then before Morell could arrange his forces he countermands it. There must have been two hours of daylight after receiving that order. But General Porter says the enemy was in front of him. Is that an excuse? Did he try to find out as a fact whether or not the enemy was in front of him? Was it not better for General Porter and his command to be sacrificed than an utter rout result?

Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs but to do and die.

Was this the spirit that animated Wallace, Prentiss, Hulbert, and their troops on that bloody field of Shiloh, at the "Hornets' Nest," that resisted the terrific attacks of the flower of the confederate forces for six long hours and saved General Grant's army from defeat?

Was this the spirit that animated General Longstreet on the third day at Gettysburg, when ordered by General Lee, against his remonstrance, to attack the Federal position at Cemetery Hill? No, General Longstreet faithful to the cause he had sworn to uphold, obedient to his commander's orders, prepared his troops for the attack, and at the time stated those nine brigades responded to the signal. The deeds of heroism performed on each side of the contest on that field redound to the glory of American courage and have received the plaudits of the world.

There is no evidence that there was a large force of the enemy in front of General Porter. It is true that Rosser's troops had kicked up some dust as the galloped up and down the road with brush tied to their horses. From the evidence we must come to the conclusion that neither Porter nor his generals knew what was in front of them, nor do we find that they made any attempt to ascertain. He failed to obey the orders of his superior officer. That order should have been obeyed even if he had to advance his columns into the midst of the enemy. Yes, attack the enemy even if he knew that Lee, Longstreet, and the entire Southern army were to oppose him.

There is no excuse for General Porter that might be urged in behalf of a volunteer officer. He was a trained soldier, educated for the profession, and had seen much service. He knew that the life of a soldier was one of duty; that he must be obedient, and always ready; that when "called out by the trumpet, he must come;" that "when ordered to go forth in some perilous enterprise, he must go." There is no arguing; "he must obey orders even though it be to march into the cannon's mouth." "Obedience, submission, discipline, courage, these are the characteristics which make a soldier." General Porter, instead of wishing to be back with McClellan, instead of looking upon General Pope with distrust and hatred, should have adopted the motto of Lord Lawrence, "Be ready;" or the great Wellington's saying in Portugal,

I came here to perform my duty, and I neither do nor can enjoy satisfaction in anything excepting the performance of my duty to my own country.

If General Porter had possessed some of the elements of a Napoleon and had hurled his ten thousand fresh troops upon the enemy that evening, or, like Washington at Monmouth, rode at the head of his columns and charged upon the enemy, a Federal victory in all probability would have been the result.

General Porter for the disobedience of these orders was tried by a court-martial a few months after those occurrences. He was cashiered by approval of the general-in-chief, Secretary of War, and Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, as one of the Representatives on this floor from the State of Iowa I desire to enter my protest against the restoration of this man. Iowa sent forth at the call of the country eighty-three thousand of her young and best blood, who were ever found where duty called. No Iowa soldier was ever known to falter in the face of the enemy or refuse to obey an order, and I would be recreant in my duty to those brave men if I failed to, in their name, condemn this action which I fear is about to be taken by this House.

Permit me to say, sir, that I believe it is an insult to every soldier who periled his life to preserve this Republic and to those who followed so bravely, obediently, although unwisely, the stars and bars, for this House to now place upon an equality with them one who failed in the face of the enemy to obey the orders of his commander. It is an insult to the court, made up of competent and true soldiers of the Army, who gave this case a careful hearing for three months and decided that he was guilty of the charges preferred against him; an insult to the President of the United States who affirmed the verdict. In short, an insult to duty, obedience, to all that makes the true man and patriot.

Let no idle sentiment prevail in this House. We are, as it were, sitting as a court to review the action of a tribunal legally constituted twenty-three years ago. It is no time for political or personal differences. Let justice be the end in view. Let us in our deliberations remember the Goddess of Justice, Asteria, who with bandaged eyes presides over judicial proceedings with scales equally balanced. Let us decide this case so that our conscience will approve and our decision be approved by the world.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, having had under consideration the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, had come to no conclusion thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BOYLE for three days, on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. BRAGG (at 4 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

STATE OF KANSAS, Office of Secretary of State.

I, E. B. Allen, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original resolution now on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal this the — day of February, A. D. 1886, at Topeka, Kans.

[SEAL.] E. B. ALLEN, Secretary of State.

Mr. PLUMB. I present a petition of a large number of ex-Union soldiers, setting forth that the national creditors have been and are being paid 100 cents on the dollar on the obligations due them, while the soldiers of the Union were paid in greenbacks that were worth less than 50 cents on the dollar in specie, and praying that this injurious distinction be removed by proper legislation. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a petition of Local Assembly No. 3023 of the Knights of Labor, of Stuart, Iowa, praying for the passage of an act which shall secure to the employés in the Government Printing Office the rate of wages paid to them prior to March 4, 1877; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented a memorial of the local assembly of Knights of Labor of Des Moines, Iowa, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Dingley bill, relating to pilotage, and favoring the passage of the bill providing for the restoration of wages in the Government Printing Office to the compensation formerly paid; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Local Assembly No. 3902 of the Knights of Labor, of Clinton, Iowa, praying for the organization of a Territorial government over the Indian Territory and for the immediate opening of the public lands therein to homestead settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY presented a petition of the Second Congregational church of Fair Haven, Conn., praying Congress to place the Territorial government of Utah in the hands of a commission to be appointed by the President; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PAYNE presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Cleveland, Ohio, earnestly indorsing an appeal of the Lake Superior States for an appropriation to complete the improvement of the Saint Mary's River and the canal in accordance with the plans and recommendations of Lieutenant Poe, of the United States Engineers; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COKE presented a petition of the local assembly Knights of Labor of Gordon, Tex., praying that the Indian Territory be opened to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Corsicana, Tex., praying that an additional appropriation be made to secure deep water at Sabine Pass; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COKE. I present a petition of 193 citizens of Eastland and Brown Counties, Texas, praying for the free coinage of silver, for the continuance and modification of the coin-certificate system so as to authorize the issue of such certificates in denominations of one, two and five dollars, and upward, and for other legislation in regard to the same subject. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PALMER presented a petition of William Kness and other citizens of Detroit, Mich., and a petition of Herman Marx and other citizens of Detroit, Mich., praying for the abolition of the Presidency; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. INGALLS. I present a petition, numerously signed by citizens resident in the northeast part of this city, praying for the passage of Senate bill 248, to define the routes of steam-railroads entering the city of Washington and District of Columbia, and for other purposes. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES presented a petition of Christiana Tichener, widow of Robert W. Tichener, late a private in Company E, Forty-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension from the time of her late husband's discharge, on April 26, 1862, to the time of his death, on May 31, 1867; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

THE SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I beg leave to present a petition from Savannah, Ga., signed by a comparatively large number of my most intelligent, worthy, and respected fellow-citizens of that locality. The petition is printed, and is I think in the same language of the printed head of many other petitions of like character, which doubtless have a common origin, and it is in the following language:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the Forty-ninth Congress at Washington now assembled:

Your petitioners respectfully represent that it is their conviction that the law requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to coin not less than $2,000,000 per month of standard silver dollars should be immediately repealed. The law has now been in operation for over seven years, and experience has shown that not only has it failed in every promise prophesied by its projectors, but it has proven to be of great inconvenience to the people; detrimental to mercantile, manufacturing, and legitimate banking interests; dangerous to the credit and welfare of the Government, and at this time is retarding the increase of prosperity and menacing the finances of the country.

We are therefore impelled to recommend the repeal of said law; and as in duty bound will ever pray.

The petition is signed, as already stated, by a large number of very intelligent and highly respected gentlemen, including bankers, merchants, lawyers, &c. As they have done me the honor to send me the petition with the request that I lay it before the Senate, I comply with their request with pleasure. They have a perfect right as an intelligent portion of the American people to be heard by petition before this body, and I respectfully commend my worthy constituents who have signed the petition personally to your favorable consideration.

As I have already expressed at some length my views on the silver question, it may not be inappropriate for me to state in this connection that I differ in toto with the petitioners. They are right in the statement that the present law has been in operation over seven years, but they are wrong, in my judgment, in every other statement they make in reference to it.

Experience has not shown that the law has failed in every promise prophesied by its projectors. On the contrary, the prophecies of its projectors have been fulfilled almost to the very letter.

The law has not proven an inconvenience to the people, but it has been a great convenience, as it has added to the material prosperity of the country by keeping in circulation and in the Treasury a large amount of coin that would not otherwise have been in circulation at a time when the volume of currency was already too small.

The law has not proved detrimental to the mercantile, manufacturing, and legitimate banking interests of the country. On the other hand, it has greatly promoted the mercantile and manufacturing interests of the country, and it has in no way retarded the banking interests. They may sometimes have been put to a little inconvenience in handling silver money on account of its bulk, but they have in no other way sustained any material losses on account of the law, while most of them have thrown all their weight against its success and done all in their power to discredit silver. The law is not dangerous to the credit and welfare of the Government. On the other hand, without its passage the Government could not have resumed specie payments in 1869, and continued it up to the present, and the law is not at this time retarding the increase of prosperity. On the other hand, it is greatly promoting the prosperity of the country. When the crash of 1873 came upon the country we did not have the large amount of gold and silver coin to fall back upon which we had at the time of the crash of 1884, and it took about six years to recover from the shock of 1873 to the mercantile, manufacturing, and other important interests of the country. When the crash of 1884 came on we had nearly two hundred millions of silver dollars in the Treasury and in circulation, adding that much to the volume of currency and aiding to maintain a specie standard. The result has been that in about two instead of about six years the country is fast recovering from the crash, and prosperity is already on the increase. In a word, we are recovering from a financial crash much more rapidly than we did from the one of 1873, when silver was demonetized.

Finally, the law is not menacing the business of the country. On the other hand, it is increasing our prosperity, multiplying our business, and resulting in great good to the whole community. So far from the prophecies made by the advocates of the law having proved untrue, the very reverse is correct; while the prophecies made by the opponents of the law and the advocates of its repeal have from first to last proved untrue and their predictions have been utter failures. They predicted immediately after the passage of the bill that if it was continued in operation, even for a short time, it would drive the gold out of the country and reduce us to a silver standard. That has been reiterated by every Secretary of the Treasury from 1868 (the passage of the act) to the present time. Has the prophecy proved true? On the contrary, we have received in settlement of balances with European nations, in gold, an average of about $100,000,000 a year, which has gone into circulation, and our stock of gold in the country, as shown by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, is almost double that of our stock of silver dollars. The gold has greatly increased in the quantity in circulation and in the Treasury, and is constantly increasing, instead of being diminished.

I feel justified in submitting this criticism upon the petition on account of its being a printed form, originating, no doubt, at some great money center, and sent around to be used in various places by persons who can be influenced by such inspiration. If the form had not been in the shape it is, and the statements had not contained so many errors, I certainly should not have made any remarks other than the usual remarks made by a Senator on presenting the petition of his constituents.

Mr. President, this petition is signed by two or three hundred respected gentlemen. If it were deemed necessary by the advocates of the present law, who desire to continue the coinage of silver at its present standard, and a little activity were shown, petitions could easily be sent here from the State of Georgia, signed by fifty or one hundred thousand people, or more, asking that the coinage of silver be continued.

I have returned within the last day or two from a visit to my home in Georgia, where I had an opportunity of conferring freely with a great many of our most intelligent men, and I have no hesitation in saying that an overwhelming majority of the people of Georgia are opposed to the position taken by the petitioners; indeed, I do not know that I should exaggerate if I were to say that nine out of every ten of the citizens of Georgia oppose the repeal of the law authorizing the coinage of standard silver dollars.

Again vouching for the good character and high respectability of the petitioners, I move that the petition be received and be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BLACKBURN, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 91) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant a right of way for a railroad and telegraph line through the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations of Indians to the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railway Company, and for other purposes," reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Select Committee on Interstate Commerce, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. 1093) to regulate commerce, reported a bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to give notice that on some day next week, about ten days from to-day, I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill just reported for consideration.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 359) granting a pension to Margaret A. Blake;

A bill (S. 276) granting a pension to Philip C. Enders; and

A bill (S. 364) granting a pension to Nancy Battorff.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 18) for the relief of the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BLAIR. By direction of the Committee on Pensions I report sundry bills without amendment for the chairman [Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania]. These are all cases examined by him.

The following bills were placed on the Calendar with the accompanying reports:

A bill (S. 475) granting a pension to Mrs. Bridget Rush;

A bill (S. 362) granting a pension to James H. King; and

A bill (S. 1127) to amend and correct the act approved March 3, 1865, granting a pension to Sarah Hague.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 329) to increase the pension of Michael J. Hewston, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 611) for the relief of William C. Spencer, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Theodore J. Eckerson, major United States Army, retired, praying an amendment to the law in reference to grades in the military service, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Mississippi just now reported from the Committee on Military Affairs the petition of Theodore J. Eckerson adversely, and the committee was discharged. I ask to have the vote reconsidered and the petition placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon probably is not aware that petitions reported adversely or favorably are not necessarily entered on the Calendar. The motion to reconsider will be considered as pending, and the Senator can call it up at any time.

Mr. DOLPH. That will do.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 425) giving a military record to James King, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 189) granting the right of way through the Fort Selden military reservation, New Mexico, to the Rio Grande, Mexico and Pacific Railroad Company, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 560) for the relief of Hetty Martin, widow of Capt. James G. Martin, deceased, moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to, and he submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 1533) for the relief of James G. Martin, late captain and assistant quartermaster and assistant commissary of subsistence, United States Army, and his heirs and legal representatives; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GORMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to submit a report on the bill (S. 491) to provide for an American register for the steamship Caroline Miller, of Baltimore, Md. The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce without a written report accompanying it. When the bill came up for consideration some days ago a written report was directed to be prepared. I now submit that report and ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received and printed.

DUTIES OF TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. I ask that the bill be read at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks to have the bill read at length with the view to its immediate consideration. It will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 304. The Treasurer may, in his discretion, with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, authorize the assistant treasurer to act in the place and discharge any or all the duties of the Treasurer of the United States; and in the event of the absence or illness of either the assistant treasurer or himself the Treasurer, with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, may appoint from among the clerks in the Treasury any one of said clerks to be acting assistant treasurer during such absence or illness: Provided, however, That the official bond given by the principal of the office shall be held to cover and apply to the acts of the person appointed to act in his place in such cases. Such acting officer shall, moreover, for the time being, be subject to all the liabilities and penalties prescribed by law for the official misconduct in like cases of the assistant treasurer, respectively, for whom he acts."

Mr. MORRILL. There seems to be an immediate emergency for the passage of this bill. It was passed by the other House a few days since. I am informed that the assistant treasurer is so ill as not to be present in his office, and that the Treasurer has been so overworked in signing papers that his hand is swollen so badly that he is unable to sign the proper papers that are presented to him daily. Under these circumstances the Committee on Finance have directed me to ask for the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont whether the committee considered the question with reference to the liability that the act proposes to cast on the sureties on the existing bond of the Treasurer. It does seem to me that we can not by an act of Congress impose an additional liability on the sureties now on the bond of the Treasurer and hold them responsible therefor, but that it would require the execution of a new bond after the passage of this act.

Mr. MORRILL. I agree entirely with the Senator from Iowa on that point, but the emergency appeared to the committee so great that it was thought best at least to run the risk of it at the present time; and the Secretary of the Treasury can demand a new bond of the Treasurer, so as to comply with the proposed law, at any moment.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont if the assistant treasurer of the United States is an officer appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. MORRILL. He is.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill proposes to permit the assistant treasurer of the United States, with the concurrence of the Treasurer and the Secretary of the Treasury, to designate a clerk to fill that place indefinitely. It appears to me that if there is a radical defect in the service of that Department, by which there is not enough force to carry on its operations, it would be a great deal better to provide by law for some increase in the method provided by the Constitution, and not to introduce the practice here of saying that an officer, who is appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate under the Constitution, shall have the right indefinitely, without any limitation whatever in point of time, to select any clerk that he may see fit to pick out among the force in that office, without consultation with the President and without reference to the Senate, to discharge duties of the magnitude of those that are prescribed to be discharged by this officer.

Of course I know nothing about the condition of the tendons and ligaments of the right hand of the assistant treasurer. It may be that they have been, as the Senator says, so swollen by signing warrants that he is unable to continue in the discharge of his office; but if that is the case there ought to be some person selected, by the nomination of the President, with the consent of the Senate, to discharge the duties devolving upon that officer.

I have no desire to interfere with the passage of this bill—I suppose it would be impossible for me to do so if I had—but I feel it to be my duty to point out what I conceive to be a radical defect in this species of legislation.

Mr. MORRILL. Only on account of the present emergency were the Committee on Finance willing to report the bill. They would have made an amendment to it and provided that the holding of this temporary appointment should not be beyond ten days, but to make an amendment would send the bill back to the House, and under the circumstances it was thought better that we should consider the bill and have it passed.

Mr. INGALLS. The statement of the Senator from Vermont convinces me still more that this is legislation that ought not to be had. He states that the committee, were it not for the fact of the present emergency, would hesitate to recommend the adoption of a bill involving such serious considerations; that the committee believe that in an emergency of this kind there ought to be a limitation of time, and that the assistant treasurer should not be permitted to select a clerk, himself being nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, to discharge the duties, it may be for the entire remainder of his term, for there is absolutely no limitation in the bill. If it receives the signature of the President any clerk may be selected from the force in that office and discharge the duties of that position for the entire remainder of the term.

I do not think that is wise, or just, or appropriate legislation; and if the Senator from Vermont really believes that this is emergency legislation that in itself would be improper and unwise, I do not think he should be deterred by the fact that it would require an hour or two hours to get the concurrence of the other House to an amendment that he ought to offer.

I submit to him, therefore, that if this emergency does arise the House of Representatives is controlled by the friends of the administration, and if the object is to bridge over an emergency, then let us put in the proper amendment that the committee say ought to be there, and limit the exercise of this power to such period as may be appropriate, and then let the House of Representatives concur in the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me, I suggest that we limit this proposed act to a period of ninety days.

Mr. MORRILL. Ten days.

Mr. ALLISON. No; I mean to limit the whole act for a period not exceeding ninety days from the passage of the act, to be inserted at the proper place in the bill. I want the act to expire by limitation at the end of ninety days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reduced to writing and reported.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask my colleague whether he proposes an amendment which will effect security to the Government during the ninety days; because of course, the duty being discharged by a clerk designated who is not under bond, the principal would not be liable for anything that might transpire to the hurt of the public service in that time unless a new bond be given covering the conditions of this act.

Mr. ALLISON. I think, if my colleague will allow me, that that is not clear. A similar law is now upon the statute-book with reference to assistant treasurers outside of the city of Washington. I take it that the bond of the assistant treasurer covers such changes in the law as may be made from time to time respecting his duty. But surely the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury would not authorize this appointment without providing sufficient security for its enforcement.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to my colleague that that is simply an answer based upon a presumption as to what the President may do. Suppose he should not do so, then we shall have imposed by the terms of the act an obligation and risk upon the sureties on the bond that we can not enforce against them by any action should hurt come to the Government by the act of the person designated to discharge the duty.

Mr. ALLISON. My colleague is a much better lawyer than I am, but there is a provision of this kind now on the statute-book with reference to all assistant treasurers outside of the city of Washington. I do not understand that it is held by the courts or by any authority that an assistant treasurer is relieved from his bond by the mere fact that for a short space of time he designates the chief clerk or some other clerk in his office to perform the duties.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is done under existing law, and doubtless the bond that has been given under that law would be held good for that condition, but this new law would impose a new condition.

Mr. ALLISON. Suppose we should to-day impose new duties upon the Treasurer of the United States, different from those under existing law, does my colleague hold that that would vitiate the bond of the Treasurer?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hold to the proposition presented by the bill, and that is that all the duties of the office may be discharged by a clerk designated of any grade or class, and that is the imposition of an obligation upon the bondsmen which it seems to me can not be covered by existing law, and ought to be provided for by an amendment in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will be reported.

Mr. MORRILL. Allow me to have the report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the other House read, which will show the existing state of facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first matter in order will be to report the amendment as it stands. The attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is called to the amendment proposed by him to see whether the clerks have it right.

The CHIEF CLERK. Add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That this act shall be in force for the period of ninety days after its passage, and no longer.

Mr. ALLISON. That covers it.

Mr. MORRILL. It would be better to say "sixty days."

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I will say sixty days, as suggested by the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. BECK. Is a vote now to be taken on the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has been offered, and the question is on its adoption.

Mr. BECK. I think if we are going to amend the bill at all it will destroy the effect which was intended. The bill is an exact copy of section 3613 of the Revised Statutes, as gentlemen will see by reading it, extending the authority there given to the Treasurer in the class of cases specified. That section is in these words:

In case of the sickness or unavoidable absence of any assistant treasurer or depositary from his office he may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, authorize the chief clerk, or some other clerk employed therein, to act in his place, and to discharge all the duties required by law of such assistant treasurer or depositary.

The language which follows is copied from this section into the bill:

The official bond given by the principal of the office shall be held to cover and apply to the acts of the person appointed to act in his place in such cases. Such acting officer shall, moreover, for the time being, be subject to all the liabilities and penalties prescribed by law for the official misconduct in like cases of the assistant treasurer or depositary, respectively, for whom he acts.

I have no doubt when that act was passed it applied to all these bonded officers, and the bonds were then given and are now given so as to make the bond good whenever that is done, and it was framed so as to cover that class of cases. We did not have the bonds before us, but we took the precaution, it might as well be said, to send the bill to the Attorney-General this morning to have the bonds examined carefully and to see whether any new legislation was needed or whether the bonds did cover this condition of things, for fear that there might be something in the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa, and those papers are now in the hands of the Attorney-General undergoing his scrutiny.

Most of us believe that the bonds as now given will cover the cases where this necessity arises, and the necessity is now upon us. I have a letter before me now from the Treasurer saying that the assistant treasurer is sick in bed, and he himself ought to be there in his present condition, and the business of the Department can not be carried on or a single check be signed. The bill simply gives him the authority, because section 304 does not give it. That is an old law, passed long before the other was passed, limiting the authority in the Treasury Department proper. This is the language—it is very short:

SEC. 304. The Treasurer may, in his discretion, with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, authorize the assistant treasurer to act in the place and discharge any or all the duties of the Treasurer of the United States.

That is all there is of it; but when they came to provide for assistant treasurers and depositaries, then the exception was made that I have read in section 3613, of which the pending bill is a copy, applied to the Treasurer. It seems to me that there can be no serious danger when those precautions have all been had.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It does seem to me that nothing can be clearer than that section 3613 of the Revised Statutes will not cover the risk involved in the present bill. That section provides:

In case of the sickness or unavoidable absence of any assistant treasurer or depositary from his office, he may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, authorize the chief clerk, or some other clerk employed therein, to act in his place, and to discharge all the duties required by law of such assistant treasurer or depositary.

But the bill provides that the Treasurer may do this thing, which is a very different proposition from that embraced in and covered by this section of the Revised Statutes. Then the section proceeds:

The official bond given by the principal of the office—

That is, the assistant treasurer—shall be held to cover and apply to the acts of the person appointed to act in his place—

That is, in the assistant treasurer's place—in such cases. Such acting officer shall moreover, for the time being, be subject to all the liabilities and penalties prescribed by law for the official misconduct, in like cases, of the assistant treasurer or depositary, respectively, for whom he acts.

But there is no such provision with regard to the Treasurer. Therefore, this section does not provide for the difficulty that I have suggested at all, and it does seem to me that due caution in the enactment of legislation of this character would cause the Senate to hesitate until the bill can be properly amended to meet the suggestion that I have made.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to be informed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] or the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] as to the necessity of this proposed law. The statute provides, section 301, that—

There shall be in the Department of the Treasury a Treasurer of the United States, who shall be appointed, &c.

Section 303 provides that—

There shall be in the Department of the Treasury an assistant treasurer of the United States.

Section 304 provides that—

The Treasurer may, in his discretion, with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, authorize the assistant treasurer to act in the place and discharge any or all the duties of the Treasurer of the United States.

Therefore you have got an explicit provision of law, making it one of the duties of an assistant treasurer in all cases, when he is required by the Treasurer, to perform his duties.

Mr. MORRILL. But they are both disabled at the present time.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose they are disabled, the Treasurer is not disabled from authorizing the assistant——

Mr. MORRILL. But, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has only heard half of the proposition. The assistant treasurer of the United States then, by the existing law, is bound, when required, to perform all the duties of the Treasurer. That is the first step; that is one of his duties; he is required to act as Treasurer when the Treasurer is disabled. Now, section 3613 provides that—

In case of the sickness or unavoidable absence of any assistant treasurer or depositary from his office—

Including all the assistant treasurers of the United States, not merely outside of Washington but this one as well—

he may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, authorize the chief clerk, or some other clerk employed therein, to act in his place, and to discharge all the duties required by law of such assistant treasurer or depositary.

So I submit to the committee whether the provision of law is not absolute and complete to-day, to wit: One of the duties of the assistant treasurer being to act as Treasurer when the Treasurer is disabled and he is so required, and one of his powers being to have his assistant or any other clerk in his office discharge his duties when he is disabled, why do you need anything more than the order of these two officers?

Mr. ALLISON. There is much in the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts, but it seems to me that there is or may be a case where the law does not supply the remedy, and that is this case. The assistant treasurer in Washington has been sick for some two weeks and the Treasurer has been performing the duties. Now, is it not manifest that the Treasurer can not call upon the assistant treasurer to perform these duties? Why? Because he is sick; he can not be at the office; he can not be even there to designate a clerk. So the object of this bill is to provide that the Treasurer himself in the case I have supposed, and in the case that actually exists now by the absence or sickness of the assistant treasurer, may do just what the assistant treasurer could do if he was in the office.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Iowa does not quite apprehend the point or I do not apprehend him. The fact that the assistant is disabled to write does not prevent the Treasurer from calling upon him to perform the duties, one of which is to designate somebody in his own place to do it when he can not and when he is required. He says, "being required and it now becoming my duty, and I being disabled, I call on this man in my place."

Mr. ALLISON. Now, suppose the assistant treasurer was sick in Boston, and the Treasurer himself here discharging the duties of the office, and the Treasurer suddenly becomes disabled, does the Senator from Massachusetts think that there is a law which would authorize the Treasurer to write to Boston to the sick-bed of the assistant treasurer asking him to come and discharge these duties, and that the assistant treasurer then and there could designate a clerk in the office, with the approval of the Secretary, to do it?

Mr. HOAR. Very clearly.

Mr. ALLISON. Now we have the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts, a member of the Judiciary Committee, that that can be done, but the Treasurer does not think that can be done, and hence asks for the passage of this law. That is the only excuse for the passage of this act; and if the Senator from Massachusetts is right in his conclusion, of course this act is not needed. The Treasurer believes that in the absence of the assistant treasurer, and during his sickness, it is not possible for him to call on the assistant treasurer to perform this duty.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senate should agree with me, as the Senator from Iowa, I think, does, as to the legal proposition——

Mr. ALLISON. At this moment I do not say so.

Mr. HOAR. But if the Senate shall be of that opinion, what is the difficulty? It is possible that the Treasurer of the United States has not considered these two distinct and separate sections of the statutes together; but bringing them together certainly removes very much the reason for the Senate's passing in haste, without waiting an hour for the proper amendment, a bill conceded by the committee who have reported it to be an act of extremely crude and imperfect legislation.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that the report of the Judiciary Committee of the House be now read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the report submitted by Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives, on the 11th instant, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred House bill 4875, respectfully report back the same with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, with a recommendation that it do pass.

By section 304 of the Revised Statutes it is enacted as follows: "The Treasurer may, in his discretion, with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, authorize the assistant treasurer to act in the place and discharge any or all of the duties of the Treasurer of the United States."

By section 302 the Treasurer is required to give bond for the faithful discharge of his duties in a penalty of $150,000.

By section 3600 the assistant treasurer is required to give bond for the faithful discharge of his duties in a penalty to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

By section 3613 it is provided as follows: "In case of the sickness or unavoidable absence of any assistant treasurer or depositary from his office, he may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, authorize the chief clerk, or some other clerk employed therein, to act in his place, and to discharge all the duties required by law of such assistant treasurer or depositary."

The official bond given by the principal of the office shall be held to cover, and apply to the acts of, the person appointed to act in his place in such cases. Such acting officer shall, moreover, for the time being, be subject to all the liabilities and penalties prescribed by law for the official misconduct in like cases of the assistant treasurer or depositary, respectively, for whom he acts.

The bill reported gives to the Treasurer the power to select some clerk, whom he shall, with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, appoint to act as assistant treasurer during the absence or illness of either the Treasurer or assistant treasurer.

This contingency has arisen of late, and the bill proposed remedies it by supplying the place with a clerk to be selected as above stated, and the bill proposes to subject their action to the conservative provisions of section 3600, by re-enacting the latter clause thereof in terms, and without referring merely to the act itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to the Senate that the report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House which has been read at the desk does not meet the difficulty at all. This bill proposes to confer a new power and impose a new duty upon the Treasurer of the United States subsequent to the execution of his official bond; and I submit to the Senate that the section of the Revised Statutes which has been referred to does not make provision for such a change in the law and imposition of a duty; and unless this exigency is so great that we can afford the hazard of establishing so mischievous a precedent as this, it would be better to recommit this bill to the committee, in order that they may provide by proper amendment, after due consideration, for the difficulty suggested. If it be in order I will make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is in order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not desire without some effort to be responsible in any part for the establishment of a precedent which I think would be so mischievous. I move, therefore, that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 1534) for the relief of John

P. Bush and James Grigsby; which war read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1535) for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon in the city of La Fayette, Ind.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 1536) for the purchase of suitable grounds in the city of Owensborough, in the State of Kentucky, and the erection thereon of a public building for the post-office, United States collector's office, United States commissioner's office, and for the use of other United States offices in said city, and appropriating money for said purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1537) for the relief of B. B. Connor, of Louisville, Ky.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRYE. I present a bill to consolidate the departments of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes. I ask that it be twice read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

I do not mean to commit myself to the provisions of this bill by this request. The Secretary of the Navy has recommended the consolidation of the departments of the Navy. The proper committee has it now under consideration. If that committee should report favorably and the Senate should act also with favor on that bill, then I see no reason whatever why the same should not apply to the Army and why there should not be a like consolidation of its departments. This bill provides for a similar consolidation.

The bill (S. 1538) to consolidate the departments of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1539) granting a pension to Evaline Hunt, widow, and minor children of Lewis Hunt, deceased; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MAHONE introduced a bill (S. 1540) for the relief of Isaac Davenport and others, citizens of Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 1541) to amend an act passed July 5, 1884, "to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations" so that the same shall be held for homestead entries only; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1542) granting a pension to James McLaughlin; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa (by request), introduced a bill (S. 1443) fixing the rate of interest upon arrearages of taxes due July 1, 1884, and on all special improvements due the District of Columbia which may be paid within a specified time; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PALMER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1544) for the relief of John H. Russell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TELLER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1545) for classification of clerks in first-class post-offices and for fixing the salaries of the same; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MILLER, of New York (by request), introduced a bill (S. 1546) for the relief of Sarah E. E. Perine, widow and administratrix of the estate of William Perine, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GRAY introduced a bill (S. 1547) to establish a court of appeals, to provide additional circuit judges, and to make certain changes in the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1548) to amend the act of Congress of March 3, 1875, entitled "An act to determine the jurisdiction of circuit courts of the United States, and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes," and to repeal sections 639 and 640 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1549) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes; which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there is hereby forfeited to the United States, and the United States hereby resumes the title thereto, all lands heretofore granted to any State or to any corporation to aid in the construction of a railroad opposite to and conterminous with the uncompleted portion of any railroad for the construction or benefit of which lands have heretofore been granted; and all such lands are declared to be a part of the public lands and opened to settlement under the public land laws, except such as provide for pre-emption entries: Provided, That this act shall not be construed as forfeiting the right of way or depot grounds of any railroad company heretofore granted.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 43) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint expert accountants and experts in counting coin in the subtreasuries; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. GORMAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Orville Horwitz be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. MAHONE, it was Ordered, That the papers on file in the Secretary's office of the Senate pertaining to the claim of Isaac Davenport and other citizens of Virginia be withdrawn and referred to the Committee on Claims, in connection with Senate bill for the relief of the parties named.

On motion of Mr. BECK, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of B. B. Connor be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the proper committee, subject to the rule.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I rise to offer a resolution relative to the message of the President communicated to the Senate yesterday conveying the report of the Government directors of the Union Pacific Railroad for the year 1885. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the report of the directors of the Union Pacific Railway Company for the year 1885, now upon the table of the Senate, be ordered printed, and that in addition thereto the Public Printer be directed to add said report in the document containing all prior reports of said directors heretofore ordered printed.

I desire to say that that subject has been considered informally by the Committee on Printing and that the resolution is the result of their consideration. I ask for its adoption.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PROPERTY REMOVED TO INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. MAXEY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into what legislation may be necessary in order to subject property removed from any State or Territory into the Indian Territory, that is to say, into the country occupied by the five civilized tribes, to forced sale, levy, and execution, upon a writ of execution or other proper writ issued upon a judgment or decree rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction to hear and determine between the parties to the suit.

2. What legislation may be necessary to subject property removed as aforesaid into the Indian Territory aforesaid to writ of attachment or other auxiliary writ duly issued by such court as aforesaid at the commencement of suit or pending the litigation.

And said committee is directed to report by bill or otherwise.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I wish to say before I ask for the reference of the resolution that at this time no civil process whatever runs in the Indian Territory. The States of Texas, Kansas, and Arkansas, and especially the border counties, are afflicted by debtors running over into that Territory, which is entirely beyond the reach of law. The object of this resolution is to call the attention of the Judiciary Committee to the subject, to the end that that committee may report some remedial measure which will relieve that country of this great evil that it now labors under. In one single county in my State about $600,000 worth of property was run away with to the Indian Territory, where it is beyond the reach of law. That is the only country I know of within the jurisdiction of the United States where property can not be subjected to forced sale, levy, and execution upon judgment duly rendered. I think some provision should be made by law to meet cases of that kind.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Texas if it would not be more appropriate to have this examination made by the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. MAXEY. I had thought of it and I am a member of that committee, but there are some complicated questions of law involved, and I will state one of them. In many instances in relation to this property the creditor and debtor are both citizens of the same State. That raises the question as to how to meet a case of that kind. I can well apprehend, as the Senator from Iowa can, that where the parties live in different States the matter might easily be reached in the Federal courts; but that is a question which to my mind is difficult of solution, and I thought it best to have the Judiciary Committee look into that question. I think so yet.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee on the Judiciary have under consideration the question of establishing a court in the Indian Territory, and also bills authorizing the collection of debts which are contracted in the States by persons who take up their residence in the Territory, and it seems to me highly proper that they should consider in that connection the proposition of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. MAXEY. I think so. I am a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I want to say that this does not at all interfere with the Indians in any way whatever. It refers to a citizen of the United States who gets possession of the property of another citizen of the United States and throws it beyond the reach of civil process. That ought to be provided against in some way, and I hope the Committee on the Judiciary will look carefully into it and see what can be done.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw my suggestion.

The resolution was agreed to.

TARIFF REVISION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury of date February 15, 1886, in regard to the revision of the tariff. As it is a very lengthy communication, and already in print, the Chair will submit to the Senate the question as to what disposition shall be made of it.

Mr. INGALLS. Is it a response to a resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in response to a resolution of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. How does it come here?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the general provisions of law, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to communicate to Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. It ought to be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

SPECIAL LAND AGENTS.

Mr. BLAIR. If there is no objection I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the educational bill.

Several SENATORS. Calendar! Calendar!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], which came over under objection. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform the Senate as to the names and number of special agents employed by his Department for the purpose of the detection of frauds in the entries of public lands; length of time employed, respectively; compensation and expenses paid to each; the number of cases sent to said special agents for investigation and report; the number of cases reported upon by each of said agents; and during what period of time; the number of cases of entries of public lands which have been suspended, and which under the rules of the Department will require to be specially investigated before being finally decided.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have just sent for the Senator from Kansas who introduced the resolution. I have some amendments I have shown to him and to which I am sure he will make no objection. I move in the second line to strike out the words "names and;" in the fourth line, after the word "respectively," to insert "and their places of duty;" in the seventh line, after the words "and during what period of time," to insert "for each of the fiscal years 1883, 1884, 1885, and 1886 up to this date and;" then in the next line, immediately after the words "public lands," strike out have been" and insert "are now;" so as to read "the number of cases of entries of public lands which are now suspended;" and at the end of the resolution to add "and the length of time it will require to made such investigations with the present force."

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator have the resolution read as amended?

Mr. COCKRELL. I can read it as it will read if amended.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Missouri seems to suggest a good many very important amendments, and I think as the Senator from Kansas is not in, his amendments had better be printed and the resolution go over until to-morrow. I suggest that to him.

Mr. COCKRELL. All right; I have no objection to that.

Mr. ALLISON. It is very evident that the Senator from Missouri is asking for a large amount of information running back several years. I think it a very pertinent inquiry to ascertain how many clerks will be required to procure the information. The resolution had better go over until to-morrow.

Mr. COCKRELL. Shall I read the resolution just as it will be if amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will send it to the desk——

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the Secretary follow it as I read, so that there shall be no mistake——

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be printed in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can read it.

Mr. COCKRELL. As proposed to be amended the resolution would read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform the Senate as to the number of special agents employed by his Department for the detection of fraud, and their places of duty, in the entries of public lands; length of time employed consecutively; compensation and expenses paid to each; the number of cases sent to said special agents for investigation and report; the number of cases reported upon by each of said agents, and during what period of time, for each of the fiscal years 1883, 1884, 1885, and 1886 up to the present time; and the number of cases of entries of public lands which are now suspended and which under the rules of the Department will require to be specially investigated before being finally decided, and the length of time it will require to make such investigations with the present force.

That is the way the resolution reads when amended as I propose to amend it.

Mr. TELLER. I would suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he will find in the published reports the names of all the special agents and the amounts paid to them previous to 1885; but I am not certain whether the document for last year is out yet. That information is published every year. By going to the register of the Interior Department you will find the names of all the parties employed and the salaries they get.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know it is published every two years. We have a register of it, but we want this in a separate form, so that the information will be available for the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendments of the Senator from Missouri.

The amendments were agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

JUDICIAL BUSINESS IN VIRGINIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE], which comes over under objection.

The resolution was considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to inform the Senate of the number of cases in which the United States were a party or interested pending in the circuit and district courts of the eastern district of Virginia at the terms of such courts held in the year 1884, and also in the year 1885, and that he also inform the Senate whether any, and if so what, assistant district attorneys have been appointed for that district during those years or since, and at what rate of compensation; and that he transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers in the possession of the Department of Justice relating to any such appointment.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, returned to the Senate, in obedience to its request, the bill (S. 637) for the erection of a public building at Hudson, N. Y.

MARY B. HOLMES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar is now in order under Rule VIII.

Mr. BLAIR. It is so near 2 o'clock that I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the education bill. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. SEWELL. I hope the Senator will allow the first case on the Calendar to be considered. It was practically finished the other day, and was laid over only to obtain some information.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not wish to press the bill until 2 o'clock, if any Senator is very desirous to occupy the remaining time.

Mr. SEWELL. I think we might go on with the Calendar until 2 o'clock.

Mr. BLAIR. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 806) granting a pension to Mary B. Holmes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SEWELL. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] desired to know what was the rate of pension in this case. There is a short report in the case, from which it will be seen that the pension is $15 a month; so that there can be no further objection to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. BLAIR. I now renew my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being Senate bill 194.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, regarding the pending measure as vitally important to a large section of the country and highly beneficial to the entire Union, I ask the indulgence of the Senate in submitting my views, on its constitutionality, which has been called in question, and in presenting a few of the many considerations which lead me to give it my hearty support.

The bill provides, as now amended, that for eight fiscal years next after its passage there shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury the following sums, namely: The first year the sum of $7,000,000; the second year, $10,000,000; the third year, $15,000,000; the fourth year, $13,000,000; the fifth year, $11,000,000; the sixth year, $9,000,000; the seventh year, $7,000,000, and the eighth year $5,000,000, to secure the benefits of common-school education to all the children of the school age living in the United States; and that these funds are to be distributed among the several States and Territories on the basis of illiteracy. As the design of the measure is not to establish an independent or national system of schools, but rather to aid, for the time being, in the development and maintenance of the schools established by local government, and which must eventually be wholly maintained by the States and Territories wherein they exist, it is further provided that no greater part of the money appropriated shall be paid out to any State in any one year than the sum expended out of its own resources or out of moneys raised under its authority in the preceding year for the maintenance of common schools. So that, while the apportionment of the money appropriated is to be made among the States on the basis of illiteracy, the actual yearly distribution to each, after the first year, is not to exceed the amount each State shall annually expend out of its own resources, or out of moneys raised under its authority for the support and maintenance of its common schools, exclusive of the sum expended in the erection of school buildings.

The design and effect of the measure is, therefore, simply this, that for the purpose of aiding the several States in the support and establishment of more enlarged and efficient public schools required by our present and prospective educational wants and necessities, to the end that knowledge may be more widely diffused among the people, especially the youth of the country, the General Government proposes for the limited period of eight years, and on the basis of illiteracy, to supplement to the extent indicated the respective annual expenditures by the States for the encouragement and development of their common schools. It is a proposition to aid the States through their local agencies in counteracting the conditions of illiteracy now prevailing in their midst; conditions which in many, especially in the ex-slave States of the Union, have reached alarming proportions and are beyond their ability to remedy.

The only conditions attached to the appropriation are that the funds received shall be solely applied by the States to the support of their common schools, and for the education of the scholastic population, without distinction of race or color (separate schools for white and colored children being no violation of this condition); and that, to secure a second or subsequent installment or allotment under the provisions of the act, the governor of the State shall first file with the Secretary of the Interior a certified statement, giving an account of the payments or disbursements made of the school fund appropriated to his State, and also the amount expended for the preceding year out of its own resources, together with the general condition of the common-school system of the State. While this requirement of a report from the State authorities is made a ground of objection to the bill, it should be remembered that provisions similar to this have in several instances been required in granting Federal aid to school purposes in the States and were never before considered a serious objection to such aid. I call attention to two of these cases.

By acts approved December 12, 1820, and May 3, 1822, 3 per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sales of public lands within the States of Illinois, Missouri, Mississippi, and Alabama were directed to be paid over to those States for school purposes; and each of said acts contained the following provision: "An annual account of the application of the same [the funds so donated] shall be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury by such officer of the State as the Legislature thereof shall direct; and in default of such return being made, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby required to withhold the payment of any sums that may then be due, or which may thereafter become due, until a return shall be made as herein required." It was never suggested that this requirement humiliated these States. They accepted the gift with the condition.

But the present munificent appropriation for the accomplishment of an object so wise, so beneficial, and so essential to the well-being of both governments, State and Federal, is opposed, first and chiefly, on the ground of its unconstitutionality. This objection, if it can be sustained, will and should defeat the bill, and all discussion of the general considerations bearing upon this important subject, touching the policy, the expediency, or the necessity of the aid proposed would be an unprofitable and useless consumption of the time of the Senate. For if there is either no constitutional authority in Congress to apply public funds to the objects and for the purposes proposed by the bill, or if the application involves any encroachment upon the reserved rights and powers of the States, the scheme must be abandoned, and the States must be left to contend alone with the problem of illiteracy, now confronting many of them, and meet as best they may the evils, the perils, and the dangers which it may entail upon them and the country at large. This constitutional question, therefore, naturally demands, at the very outset, our attention and presents itself in two points of view. The First, bearing upon the sovereignty of the States, is whether the proposed aid either asserts or involves any assumption of Federal jurisdiction over the school systems of the States; The Second, relating to the General Government, is whether Congress has the right to appropriate money from the national Treasury in aid of these State institutions, waiving or disavowing any and all claim of jurisdiction over the same.

The public schools, to whose support and encouragement the funds appropriated are to be applied, are unquestionably local or domestic institutions, over which the Federal Government possesses no jurisdiction and can assert no rightful authority; and if the present bill either assumed or necessarily involved any right of control on the part of the General Government over these State schools it should not receive my support. But no such assumption is made or can fairly be implied from the provisions of the bill. On the contrary, there is a clear disclaimer of any intention to assert Federal jurisdiction or control over the school systems to be aided. No interference with the State's exclusive management and control of its public schools is claimed or asserted by the bill. Nothing but assistance is tendered, leaving it entirely optional with each and every State to accept or reject the benefits of the act or the help it proffers. It does not admit of debate that the States, especially those now struggling with the great evil of a widespread illiteracy, beyond their ability to remedy, and seriously affecting their social, industrial, and political interests, may accept and use Federal aid under such circumstances and upon such terms without the compromise of their dignity, the impairment of their sovereignty, or the surrender of any reserved right or power. No ingenuity of the human intellect can point out how any State function, power, or right is or can be usurped by Congress in simply tendering aid to the States for the accomplishment of a great work of vital importance to both governments, State and Federal, when such aid may be received or rejected at the pleasure of the State; or how by adopting this measure any reserved right or power is or could be surrendered by the States.

VOLUNTARY ACCEPTANCE OF ASSISTANCE SO TENDERED.

The measure neither asserts jurisdiction over any State function nor infringes upon any State prerogative. Instead of encroaching on their sovereignty, it provides the States with the means of rendering that sovereignty more secure by strengthening the underlying foundation on which their integrity and prosperity must ever rest—the intelligence of their people. Instead of weakening their powers, it supplies the States with needed resources for preserving and perpetuating their rights against Federal usurpation. Instead of promoting centralization on the part of the General Government, which can only take place by the assertion and exercise of powers reserved to the States, the real tendency of the measure is to strengthen, to build up, and to make the States what our system of Government intended them to be, and what they should ever remain, the great massive pillars on which the Federal fabric was founded and upon which it must continue to rest for its proper support; for when those supporting columns are subverted or undermined, whether by the prevalence of illiteracy or by other causes, this magnificent superstructure of our fathers will fall and crumble into ruins.

It is hardly necessary to consume further time on this branch of the subject, for it must be clear to every candid mind that no constitutional objections can be successfully urged against the present bill from the standpoint of the States.

How stands the question as it relates to the General Government? Has Congress, under the Constitution, the right to appropriate money in aid of the common schools of the country, disavowing any claim of jurisdiction? In other words, can the General Government, by the application of public funds, assist and encourage these domestic institutions as the agencies and instrumentalities to effect the removal of the evils arising from illiteracy and to secure the benefits resulting from the general diffusion of knowledge—the evils to be removed and the benefits to be secured affecting to a large extent, if not in equal proportions, both governments, State and Federal? The opponents of the bill dispute this proposition and insist, as I understand their position, that Congress has no authority to appropriate the national funds except in the execution of the powers delegated to the General Government; that the right of appropriation is limited and restricted to the objects and purposes embraced in the enumerated authorities vested in Congress; that Congress can lawfully grant or expend the money of the Government only for purposes or upon objects over which the United States have jurisdiction under the Constitution; that the application of its funds to any measure involves the assertion of sovereignty over that measure, and consequently that Federal authority to aid State schools necessarily includes Federal authority over those schools.

This position is not new. It is simply the revival of a construction which at an early period of the Government found expression in the following proposition: "That whenever money has been raised by the general authority and is to be applied to a particular measure, a question arises whether that particular measure is within the enumerated authorities vested in Congress. If it be, the money requisite for it may be applied to it; if not, no such application could be made." But this attempted, or rather suggested, restriction upon the right of appropriation was not sanctioned or adopted, and could not be maintained without greatly diminishing, if not destroying, the Government's ability to accomplish the great objects and purposes for which it was ordained and established. The distinguished statesman who first advanced it practically abandoned it at a later period, as will hereafter be shown. It can not be successfully revived and sustained at this day. It is not only not warranted by any proper interpretation of the Constitution, but is opposed by the overwhelming weight of authority and contradicted by the contemporaneous exposition of the Constitution, practiced and acquiesced in since the commencement of the Government. I submit, therefore, with confidence that instead of the application of public funds being confined or limited to the objects included in the enumerated powers, and instead of Federal jurisdiction being a necessary accompaniment of such applications, the construction is now firmly settled that the right of appropriation is more extensive than the objects over which Congress may exercise powers or assert jurisdiction; that it extends to cases and purposes beyond them, and embraces such objects of a general character as affect the welfare of the Union or in which the States may have a common concern or mutual interest. Under this construction of its authority Congress may make the appropriation contemplated by the bill if the advantages of education or the evils of illiteracy can be fairly considered as matters of general concern or objects in which the General Government and the States have a common interest. That these subjects have been treated in the past as objects of national concern, so far as regards the application of public funds or property, will not admit of serious question.

The policy of aiding education and promoting the diffusion of knowledge among the people is contemporaneous with the existence of the General Government. It was incorporated into our system as one of the permanent objects of national concern under the Confederation, and has since received the same uniform recognition and support at the hands of the Federal Government.

The cessions of the separate States of their claims to the public domain were made upon the basis that the lands were to be "disposed of for the common benefit of the United States." How has this condition been executed? By the ordinance of May 20, 1785, for ascertaining the mode of disposing of this territory, lot No. 16 of every township was reserved for the maintenance of public schools within said township. The ordinances of 1787 gave this reservation in perpetuity for the purpose of public education, and contained the following provision:

ART. 3. Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged.

Whether the public schools thus endowed and to be "forever encouraged" by the United States were to be established under national or State control remained an open question, and the lands were held in reservation merely until the State of Ohio was admitted into the Union, when it was settled that they should be organized, managed, and controlled by the State.

In the act authorizing the formation of the State of Ohio it was provided that the reserved section 16 in every township should be granted to the inhabitants of such township for the use of schools, and by the act of Congress of March 3, 1803, that certain other lands in said State, "together with all the tracts of land previously appropriated for school purposes, should be vested in the Legislature of Ohio, in trust, for the use aforesaid and for no other use, intent, or purpose whatever." From the lands so donated by the United States Ohio has secured a permanent endowment in trust for public schools amounting to $4,289,718.52. Congress thus appropriated to the purpose of popular education in a particular State public property which the Government by the very terms of its acquisition was to dispose of "for the common benefit of the United States." That application of common property for the establishment of schools in a single State has never been questioned as a proper exercise of the Government's authority to dispose of the same "for the common benefit" of the country. It inaugurated an enlightened and comprehensive policy, which has since been wisely and steadily pursued by the General Government, of aiding the States in the matter of education without assuming or attempting any control over their schools. Each new State upon its admission into the Union has been the recipient from the General Government of such aid bestowed for the advancement of the general welfare of the whole. Up to June 30, 1880, Congress had donated to the States 67,893,919 acres of the public domain for public or common schools; for seminaries or universities 1,165,520 acres, and for agricultural and mechanical colleges in each State 9,600,000 acres in land and land scrip, while in addition to these land grants millions of the proceeds arising from the sales of the public lands have from time to time been appropriated by Congress for State educational purposes both by general and special acts too numerous to be here cited in detail.

The authority of the General Government thus to apply this public property or its proceeds, which it held as the trustee for the common benefit of all the people of the United States, is generally referred to and rested upon that provision of the Constitution which empowers Congress "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." The same power of disposition here given over its territory is by the express terms of the grant conferred as to other property of the Government. Now what do these words "other property" include? If they are to have any meaning whatever, they clearly embrace everything that may be the subject of ownership by the Government. They include personalty of every character and description, including money in the Government vaults, however raised or acquired, whether by taxation or otherwise. The attempt to draw a distinction between the public lands or their proceeds and other property (embracing moneys on hand) of the United States, so far as the disposing authority of Congress is concerned, rests upon no solid principle and is supported by no argument or sound reasons yet brought to my attention.

Mr. MORGAN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. Is this bill to appropriate moneys now on hand or moneys to be derived from taxation?

Mr. JACKSON. I shall come to that in a few moments.

The public lands and their proceeds are as much the property of the Government as its money in the Treasury. The acquisition of these lands, whether by cession or purchase, was as much for the benefit of all as money arising from any legitimate source. In his veto of the indigent insane land bill, in 1854, President Pierce declared his inability to see any distinction between the appropriation of land and money. "The public domain," he said, "is the common property of the Union just as much as the surplus proceeds of that and of duties on imports remaining unexpended in the Treasury. I have been unable to discern any distinction on constitutional grounds or grounds of expediency between an appropriation of $10,000,000 directly from the money in the Treasury for the object contemplated and the appropriation of lands presented for my sanction. I respectfully submit that in a constitutional point of view it is wholly immaterial whether the appropriation be in money or in land."

It is not now an open question that Congress possesses, under the clause in question, over the public domain the combined authority of the General and a State government, and may appropriate the same, or its proceeds, to the establishment and encouragement of State schools; and by the very terms of the grant conferring this authority we may legally appropriate money in the Treasury to any object or for any purpose to which we may legally appropriate land or the proceeds arising from the sales thereof. There is no escape from this conclusion on the question of Congressional authority, and if an object or purpose (like the diffusion of knowledge) is of sufficient importance, either to the State or country at large, to be worthy of aid and encouragement from the General Government in the shape of public lands or their proceeds, it is difficult to understand why it is not equally deserving of such assistance in the shape of money in the Treasury.

The opponents of the measure under consideration not only attempt to draw this unwarranted distinction between the authority of Congress over the public lands and money, in respect to the right of appropriation by Congress, but passing beyond that, they assert that while the application of lands or the funds arising from their sales to State school purposes involves no assumption of authority or jurisdiction by the General Government over the domestic institutions aided or over the subject of education in the States, the appropriation of money to the same objects would be attended with that result. This is mere assertion, as strange as it is untenable. It rests upon no authority and is supported by no reason. Federal jurisdiction and control no more follow the bestowal of money to a given object or purpose than results from the application of land to the same object. It was never imagined or suggested by the most extreme advocate of State rights or of strict construction of the Constitution that the grants of lands for educational purposes in the States included the right to control the local school system so aided, and no such consequence can possibly result from the application of public funds to the same objects when no such claim is asserted in the bill making the appropriation. It would be a waste of time to dwell longer on this fancied difficulty.

But it is said that if the comprehensive sovereign power of disposition over Government lands or other property extends to money, Congress may, by the exercise of its taxing power, keep its vaults filled with money to be applied at its discretion. That the taxing power could be improperly exercised so as to enlarge or increase surplus revenues in the Treasury is merely to suggest that the taxing power may be abused. Like all powers conferred upon Congress it is subject to abuse, and for such abuse the representatives are responsible to the people. There is nothing, therefore, in this suggestion. The clause under consideration is an independent power, having no relation to the taxing power. It deals only with what the Government owns and possesses in the shape of property, without reference to the mode of its acquisition; and the appropriation of its funds as contemplated by the present bill can not be regarded as a revenue measure, which must originate in the House; nor does it necessarily involve any increase of taxation.

The application of the proceeds arising from sales of the public lands to school purposes in the States, to the extent that the available funds of the Government are thereby diminished, has precisely the same relation to, and indirect or incidental effect upon taxation as the proposed appropriation of money generally. Our annual surplus revenues since 1866, under past and present revenue systems, have largely exceeded the yearly appropriation to be made under the pending measure. We have had a continued surplus larger than the yearly appropriation to be made under this bill. Suppose such surpluses should continue, as they are likely to do, and in the future, as the annual appropriations under this bill have to be made, there are sufficient unappropriated funds in the Treasury to meet the requirements of the measure, can they not be so applied as the property of the Government, over which Congress has full disposing authority? If I understand the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] correctly, he concedes this when he says that "what money there is now in the Treasury, being the property of the United States, you may divert or apply to any purpose not forbidden by the Constitution." So that according to this concession, if there should be money on hand, as the future yearly appropriations are to be made, it may be applied as provided by the bill. Why, then, should constitutional objections be now interposed in anticipation of a deficiency, such as would involve the necessity of raising additional revenue by the exercise of the taxing power, which may never occur?

But, Mr. President, the advocates of this measure are not restricted or confined to the clause of the Constitution conferring upon Congress the power to dispose of the territory or "other property" of the United States for the authority to make the appropriation now proposed. We may concede that it presents the question directly whether Congress has the authority to so appropriate this money, treating it as raised or to be raised by taxation; and we insist that ample warrant for its authority so to do is found in section 8, Article I, of the Constitution, empowering Congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." The proper construction to be given the words "to provide for the common defense and general welfare" has been the great debatable ground of the Constitution. Three different constructions were at times placed upon these terms; one, that they constituted a distinct, substantive, and independent power. This interpretation would have made ours a government of unlimited powers and Congress omnipotent, notwithstanding the succeeding enumeration of specific grants. It could not be maintained, and is now universally discarded.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has vigorously, and I may say successfully, attacked this exploded construction and the wide field of power, but in doing so he has failed to meet the real question presented by the pending bill, which neither involves nor rests upon this abandoned interpretation of the clause.

A second construction insisted on was that the clause was a mere prelude or index to the succeeding enumerated powers; that the words were without meaning, mere "harmless terms" or a general phrase, which pointed to the subsequently specified powers. This construction practically struck the clause from the Constitution, and left the taxing power either wholly unlimited or restricted to the mere payment of the debts. It was neither sustained by argument nor followed in practice.

The third construction treated the clause neither as an independent power nor as meaningless, but as a limitation upon or qualification of the taxing power, and a designation of the purposes for which money might be raised in the exercise of that power. It is now generally, if not universally, conceded that this is the proper interpretation to be placed on the clause. So that the real meaning of this section as sanctioned by all commentators on the Constitution and all the great names of highest authority, including Mr. Jefferson, is this: That Congress has the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, &c., in order "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States;" that the payment of the debts and the providing for the common defense and general welfare are the purposes for which taxes may be levied and collected. Raising the money involves the exercise of the power which is granted in comprehensive though not unlimited terms, while the expenditure of the money so raised involves the exercise of Congressional discretion in discharging the duty of applying it to purposes of common defense and general welfare. That Congress has the right to apply the money to the purposes for which it is raised is necessarily included in this acknowledged construction of the clause. Who is to determine what defense is common or what welfare is general or what expenditures shall be made in providing for the same? If Congress is not invested with this authority, who is? It manifestly rests with Congress. But the position has been taken and will be again assumed that while these designated objects constitute the purposes for which money may be raised by the exercise of the taxing power, still Congress can not so apply the money unless that common defense and general welfare can be reached through the subsequently specified power. This is only a new form of stating the second construction of this clause, already referred to and never sanctioned. No such restriction upon the application of public funds is warranted by the language of the Constitution and it is opposed by the undoubted weight of authority.

I shall stand by the faith of the fathers on this question, as the Senator from Alabama suggested. Let us see now what the faith of the fathers is on this subject.

After placing upon this general-welfare clause the general construction given above Chancellor Kent says:

> That Congress possess the power to appropriate money raised by taxation or otherwise for other purposes, in their discretion, than those pointed out in the enumerated powers, is a question that has given rise to very able and acute discussions, and the affirmative side of the question has been sustained and successfully vindicated by the practice of the Government and the weighty authority, among others, of Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Monroe in celebrated documents under their official sanction.

I ask attention to these and other authorities on the question. Mr. Hamilton, in his celebrated report as Secretary of the Treasury, in 1791, on manufactures, first asserted the right of Congress to appropriate public funds to other objects than those embraced in the enumerated powers, and maintained the proposition from the words and intent of the Constitution with a power of argument never surpassed and never answered. I ask the indulgence of the Senate in giving a single extract from his argument.

He says:

> The National Legislature has express authority to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare, with no other qualifications than that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States; that no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to numbers; and that no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State. These three qualifications excepted, the power to raise money is plenary and indefinite, and the objects to which it may be appropriated are no less comprehensive than the payment of the public debts and the provkling for the common defense and the general welfare. The terms "general welfare" were doubtless intended to signify more than was expressed or imported in those which preceded; otherwise numerous exigencies incident to the affairs of the nation would have been left without provision. The phrase is as comprehensive as any that could have been used, because it was not fit that the constitutional authority of the Union to appropriate its resources should have been restricted within narrower limits than the general welfare, and because this necessarily embraces a vast variety of particulars which are susceptible neither of specification nor of definition.
> It is therefore of necessity left to the discretion of the National Legislature to pronounce upon the objects which concern the general welfare and for which, under that description, an appropriation of money is requisite and proper, and there seems no room for a doubt that whatever concerns the general interests, of learning, of agriculture, of manufactures, and of commerce, are within the sphere of the national councils, so far as regards the application of money. The only qualification of the generality of the phrase in question which seems to be admissible is this: That the object to which an appropriation of money is to be made must be general not local; its operation extending in fact, or by possibility, throughout the Union, and not confined to a particular spot. No objection ought to arise to this construction from a supposition that it would imply a power to do whatever else should appear to Congress conducive to the general welfare. A power to appropriate money with this latitude, which is granted in express terms, would not carry a power to do any other thing not authorized in the Constitution either expressly or by fair implication.

In another and later great state paper Hamilton again reasserted this proposition, as follows:

> It is true that Congress can not, without breach of trust, lay taxes for any other purpose than the general welfare, but so neither can any other government. The welfare of the community is the only legitimate end for which money can be raised on the community. Congress can be considered as only under one restriction which does not apply to other governments. They can not apply the money they raise to any purpose merely or purely local. But with this exception they have as large a discretion in relation to the application of money as any legislature whatever. The constitutional test of a right application must always be whether it be for a purpose of general or local nature. If the former there can be no want of constitutional power. The quality of the object, as how far it will really promote or not the welfare of the Union, must be a matter of conscientious discretion, and the arguments for or against a measure in this light must be arguments concerning expediency or inexpediency, not constitutional right.

But Hamilton was not alone in the construction which asserted that objects of general concern, or which may be conducive to the benefit of the whole, may be aided by the application of money, although such objects do not fall within any powers specially conferred upon Congress. President Washington fully concurred in this construction, as his repeated recommendations to Congress of objects of this sort, especially of the encouragement of learning, of manufactures, of agriculture, and of a great civil university, will abundantly prove. He urged that institutions for the promotion of agriculture and of education, especially in the science of government, should be supported by the public purse. What specific powers of the General Government covered or embraced such objects as institutions for the promotion of agriculture and civil instruction?

John Adams also sanctioned the construction which Hamilton had advocated; and among the objects which he declared should receive the earnest attention and patronage of his administration he enumerated "every rational effort to encourage schools, colleges, universities, academies, and every institution for propagating knowledge and virtue among all classes of people, not only for their benign influence on the happiness of life in all its stages and of society in all its forms, but as the only means of preserving our Constitution from its natural enemies, the spirit of sophistry, the spirit of party, and the spirit of intrigue and corruption."

But opponents of the present measure, while admitting that Mr. Jefferson placed upon the general-welfare clause the construction I have stated, which logically leads to the right of Congress to apply money as now claimed, yet cite extracts from his private correspondence, published since his death, to show that he denied the right of appropriation asserted by Hamilton, and favored a strict construction of the clause in question by limiting its operation to the execution of the subsequently enumerated or specific grants of power. This may have been Mr. Jefferson's private theory; but his practice, as illustrated by his official acts, sanctioned "the principle in its most imposing aspects."

In theory he denied the constitutional authority for the purchase of Louisiana and the right of Congress to appropriate the money to pay for it; but in practice he resolved his doubts in favor of the "national good," gave his official approval to all the measures for the completion of that purchase, and thus concurred in the exercise of the power of taxation upon the people to the extent of $11,250,000 to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the Union, actively supported by his great Secretary of State, Mr. Madison. Mr. Rodney, of Delaware, a distinguished lawyer and statesman, an ardent friend and supporter of Mr. Jefferson's administration, and afterward Attorney-General under Mr. Madison, was the leading advocate in the House of Representatives for the appropriation to complete that purchase, and he expressly cited this common-defense and general-welfare clause as conferring upon Congress the authority to appropriate the money needed therefor, Mr. Jefferson then saying that in this construction of his friend's he would acquiesce "with satisfaction." The right of appropriation thus asserted to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare was not only approved by Mr. Jefferson, but was acquiesced in by the country, and furnished the precedent for the subsequent purchase of Florida from Spain and other territorial purchases since made.

On this Louisiana purchase and on Mr. Jefferson's approval of the act appropriating public funds for the construction of the Cumberland road in 1806, General Jackson, in his Maysville veto message, thus comments:

In the administration of Mr. Jefferson we have two examples of the exercise of the right of appropriation which, in the considerations that led to their adoption and in their effects upon the public mind, have had a greater agency in marking the character of the power than any subsequent events. I allude to the payment of $15,000,000 for the purchase of Louisiana and to the original appropriation for the construction of the Cumberland road; the latter act deriving much weight from the acquiescence and approbation of three of the most powerful of the original members of the confederacy, expressed through their respective Legislatures. Although the circumstances of the latter case may be such as to deprive so much of it as relates to the actual construction of the road of the force of an obligatory exposition of the Constitution, it must nevertheless be admitted that so far as the mere appropriation of money is concerned they present the principle in its most imposing aspect. No less than twenty-three different laws have been passed through all the forms of the Constitution, appropriating upward of $2,500,000 out of the national Treasury in support of that improvement with the approbation of every President of the United States, including my predecessor, since its commencement.

These official acts justify the statement made by Mr. Jefferson's accomplished biographer, Professor Tucker (page 466, volume 2), that "Mr. Jefferson's construction of the (Federal) Constitution was strict or liberal, according as he conceived the national good would be best promoted by it." The construction he would have favored on the important subject of aid to popular education may be inferred from his message of November 8, 1808, in which, after referring to the probable accumulation of surpluses of revenue beyond what could be applied to the payment of the public debt, he said:

Shall it lie unproductive in the public vaults? Shall the revenue be reduced, or shall it not rather be appropriated to the improvements of roads, canals, rivers, education, and other great foundations of prosperity and union, under the power which Congress may already possess, or such amendment of the Constitution as may be approved by the States?

Regarding education as among the great foundations of prosperity and union, and in view of his liberal construction in favor of what he conceived would best promote the national good, it may well be doubted whether he would have disapproved of the measure under consideration.

But the great name of Mr. Madison is appealed to with confidence as an authority against the right of appropriation claimed by the advocates of this bill, and an extract from his speech, made in February, 1792, on the cod-fishery bounty bill, is cited as the wall of adamant that stands across the passage of this bill. He spoke as follows:

There are consequences, sir, still more extensive, which, as they follow clearly from the doctrine combated, must either be admitted or the doctrine must be given up. If Congress can employ money indefinitely to the general welfare and are the sole judges of the general welfare, they may take the care of religion into their own hands; they may appoint teachers in every State, county, and parish, and pay them out of the public Treasury; they may take into their own hands the education of children, establishing in like manner schools throughout the Union; they may assume the provision for the poor; they may undertake the regulation of all roads other than post-roads; in short, everything from the highest object of State legislation down to the most minute object of police would be thrown under the power of Congress.

These were the consequences which Mr. Madison insisted would follow from the doctrine he was combating. What was "the doctrine combated," and which led to such results? It was, as will clearly appear from an examination of his speech, the construction then asserted, but since abandoned and by no one now insisted on, that this common-defense and general-welfare clause constituted an abstract, independent, and indefinite grant of power—power in the sense of conferring legislative regulation and control over all objects deemed promotive of the general welfare. In supporting the present bill I have disavowed and do again distinctly disclaim any such construction as Mr. Madison was combating. My position is that the terms "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare," following the taxing power, are a limitation or qualification of that power, that they define the purposes for which it may be exercised, and that in the application of the money so raised to the great purposes designated Congress is not restricted to the subsequently enumerated powers, but has the right to appropriate the public funds in the interest of the common defense and general welfare to other objects over which it may not have jurisdiction.

While the above extract from Mr. Madison's speech does not touch these propositions, it is true that he subsequently, in 1800, expressed the opinion that the right of appropriation under the general-welfare clause was limited to the execution of the other specifically enumerated powers. His position, as set forth in his celebrated report on the Virginia resolutions of 1798, was that—

Whenever money has been raised by the general authority and is to be applied to a particular measure, a question arises whether the particular measure be within the enumerated authorities vested in Congress. If it be, the money requisite for it may be applied to it. If it be not, no such application can be made.

This construction practically struck from the Constitution the clause "to provide for the common defense and general welfare," by treating it as without meaning, a mere prelude or index to the subsequent enumerated powers, or as merely general terms, explained and limited by the specifications in the succeeding grants of power. It was never sanctioned or acquiesced in as the correct exposition of the Constitution.

General Jackson, in his Maysville road veto message, says of this position of Mr. Madison:

The symmetry and purity of the Government would doubtless have been better preserved if this restriction of the power of appropriation could have been maintained without weakening its ability to fulfill the great objects of its institution, an effect so likely to attend its admission, notwithstanding its apparent fitness, that every subsequent administration of the Government, embracing a period of thirty out of the forty-two years of its existence, has adopted a more enlarged construction of the power.

Did Mr. Madison himself adhere to this restriction on the right of appropriation asserted by him, or did his opinion on this subject, under the practice of the Government, undergo any change? Let us see.

In 1792 he opposed the cod-fishery bounty bill, on the grounds on which it was placed, as unconstitutional. On the 30th of May, 1813, as President of the United States, he approved the bill providing a bounty on all exported pickled fish of the United States fisheries—a measure identical in principle with the cod-fishery bounty. In 1794, as a member of the House, Mr. Madison opposed the measure for the relief of the San Domingo refugees, saying "that the Government of the United States is a definite Government, confined to specified objects; that charity is no part of the legislative duty of the Government; that it would puzzle any gentleman to lay his finger on any part of the Constitution which would authorize the Government to interfere in the relief of the San Domingo sufferers; that it involved the constitutional question whether the money of our constituents can be appropriated to any other than the specified powers." The act passed over his objection and received the sanction of President Washington. On the 8th of May, 1812, Mr. Madison's constitutional difficulties had disappeared, and as President he approved a similar bill appropriating $50,000 for the relief of the citizens of Venezuela.

Again, in vetoing the bill setting apart the bonus to be paid by the national bank and the United States share of its dividends for the construction of certain improvements in the States, which Mr. Madison objected to on the ground that it asserted a power in the Federal Government to construct roads and canals within the limits of a State, he, however, conceded the right of Congress to appropriate money in aid of objects beyond its jurisdiction, for after stating his objections to the bill then before him he said:

A restriction of the power "to provide for the common defense and general welfare" to cases which are to be provided for by the expenditure of money would still leave within the legislative power of Congress all the great and most important measures of Government, money being the ordinary and necessary means of carrying them into execution.

Of this statement General Jackson, in his Maysville veto, says:

I have not been able to consider these declarations [of Mr. Madison] in any other point of view than as a concession that the right of appropriation is not limited by the power of Congress to carry into effect the measure for which the money is asked, as was formerly contended.

Mr. Madison was still living and a close observer of public events when General Jackson officially placed this construction on his official language, and never, so far as I have noticed, dissented from its correctness.

But to show Mr. Madison's position still more clearly, I call the attention of gentlemen who rely upon his early opinions to another fact. In 1791 he denied the constitutionality of the Bank of the United States. In 1817, as President of the United States, he approved the bill rechartering that bank. I do not refer to this for the purpose of showing the inconsistency between his legislative opinions and his official acts as President. He has vindicated himself against any such charge, and on grounds which fully sustain the supporters of the present bill. In writing to Mr. Ingersoll, on the 25th of June, 1831, he says:

The charge of inconsistency between my objections to the constitutionality of such a bank in 1791 and my assent in 1817 turns on the question how far legislative precedents expounding the Constitution ought to guide succeeding Legislatures and to override individual opinions. * * * The case in question has its true analogy in the obligation arising from judicial expositions of the law on succeeding judges—the Constitution being a law to the legislator, as the law is a rule of decision to the judge.

After referring to the authoritative force and effect of precedents in judicial decisions and the grounds on which the principle rests, he proceeds:

Can it be of less consequence that the meaning of a constitution should be fixed and known than that the meaning of a law should be so? Can, indeed, a law be fixed in its meaning and operation unless the Constitution be so? On the contrary, if a particular Legislature, differing in the construction of the Constitution, from a series of preceding constructions, proceed to act on that difference, they not only introduce uncertainty and instability in the Constitution, but in the laws themselves; inasmuch as all laws preceding the new construction and inconsistent with it are not only annulled for the future but virtually pronounced nullities from the beginning. * * * Has the wisest and most conscientious judge ever scrupled to acquiesce in decisions in which he has been overruled by the matured opinions of the majority of his colleagues and subsequently to conform himself thereto, as to authoritative expositions of the law? And is it not reasonable that the same view of the official oath should be taken by a legislator acting under the Constitution, which is his guide, as is taken by a judge acting under the law, which is his.

There is in fact and in common understanding a necessity of regarding a course of practice as above characterized in the light of a legal rule of interpreting a law; and there is a like necessity of considering it a constitutional rule of interpreting a constitution. * * * Let it then be left to the decision of every intelligent and candid judge, which, on the whole, is most to be relied on for the true and safe construction of the Constitution, that which has the uniform sanction of successive legislative bodies through a period of years and under the varied ascendency of parties; or that which depends upon the opinions of every new Legislature, heated as it may be by the spirit of party, eager in the pursuit of some favorite object, or led away by the eloquence and address of popular statesmen, themselves perhaps under the influence of the same misleading causes. It was in conformity with the view here taken of the respect due to deliberate and reiterated precedent that the Bank of the United States, though on the original question held to be unconstitutional, received the executive signature in the year 1817.

The sound and conservative principle here announced no doubt led Mr. Madison as President to approve the $50,000 appropriation in 1812 for the relief of the citizens of Venezuela and the fishery bounty bill of 1813, measures which in 1792 and 1794 he regarded as unconstitutional, and also led him to make the concession in 1817, as stated by General Jackson—

That the right of appropriation is not limited by the power to carry into effect the measure for which the money is asked, as was formerly contended.

In view of the continued exercise of this right and of the principle so clearly and forcibly stated by him, I submit that the deservedly high authority of Mr. Madison can not be fairly arrayed against the right of appropriation presented by the bill under consideration, when, too, it is remembered that he favored and recommended to Congress the establishment of a great seminary of learning by the National Legislature as the means of enlightening the opinions, expanding the patriotism, and assimilating the principles, the sentiments, and the manners of the youth of the country, it being universally admitted, as he says, "that a well-instructed people alone can be permanently a free people."

Mr. Monroe next had occasion to consider officially this direct question, which was presented in this shape: In 1822 Congress passed a bill making an appropriation for continuing the Cumberland road, which contained provisions for Federal supervision and control. The original appropriation for this road, commenced under Mr. Jefferson's administration and continued under Mr. Madison's, contained no assertion of Federal jurisdiction over the same. Mr. Monroe considered the provision of this act assuming such jurisdiction by the Government as unconstitutional. He asserted that no right of jurisdiction or sovereignty resulted from the appropriation made for the road with the assent of the States through which it was constructed; that while the States might assent to the appropriation of money by the General Government within their limits for such purposes, they could not, even by express consent, confer or grant any power of Federal jurisdiction over the improvement or subject to which the money was applied. He accordingly vetoed the bill, and accompanying his veto message he transmitted to Congress a separate document of marked ability, regarded by many competent judges as the ablest state paper that ever issued from the executive department, giving his views and exposition of the Constitution in respect to the authority of Congress to appropriate money to other objects or for other purposes than those embraced in the specifically enumerated powers.

In that great state document he clearly demonstrated that the clause "to provide for the common defense and general welfare" was neither a distinct and original power nor mere general terms qualified and controlled by the after-enumerated powers; that their true import and meaning was a limitation upon the taxing power, intended to designate the purposes to which money raised by taxation should be applied; that they conferred upon Congress the right to appropriate the public money and nothing more; that the right of appropriation was distinct from the right of jurisdiction and sovereignty, and that in such application Congress was not confined to the objects embraced in the enumerated powers. One or two quotations from his argument are appropriate to this discussion and deserving of special notice. He says:

The powers specifically granted to Congress are what are called the enumerated powers, and are numbered in the order in which they stand; among which that contained in the first clause holds the first place in point of importance. If the power created by the latter part of the clause is considered an original grant independent and unconnected with the first, as in that case it must be, then the first part is entirely done away, as are all the other grants in the Constitution, being completely absorbed in the transcendent power granted in the latter part. But if the clause be construed in the sense contended for, then every part has an important meaning and effect; not a line or a word in it is superfluous. A power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises subjects to the call of Congress every branch of the public revenue, internal and external; and the addition to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare gives the right of appropriating the money raised, that is, of appropriating it to the purposes specified, according to a proper construction of the terms. Hence it follows that it is the first part of the clause only which gives a power, which affects in any manner the power remaining to the States; as the power to raise money from the people, whether it be by taxes, duties, imposts or excises, though concurrent in the States as to taxes and excises, must necessarily do. But the use or application of the money after it is raised is a power altogether of a different character. It imposes no burden on the people, nor can it act on them in a sense to take power from the States, or in any sense in which power can be controverted or become a question between the two governments. The application of money raised under a lawful power is a right or grant which may be abused. It may be applied partially among the States or to improper purposes in our foreign and domestic concerns; but still it is a power not felt in the sense of other powers, since the only complaint which any State can make of such partiality or abuse is that some other State or States have obtained greater benefit than by a just rule of apportionment they were entitled to. The right of appropriation is, therefore, from its nature secondary and incidental to the right of raising money; and it was proper to place it in the same grant and same clause with that right.

* * * * * * *

I have dwelt thus long on this part of the subject from an earnest desire to fix in a clear and satisfactory manner the import of the second part of this grant, well knowing from the generality of the terms used their tendency to lead into error. I indulge a strong hope that the view herein presented will not be without effect, but will tend to satisfy the unprejudiced and impartial that nothing more was granted by that part than a power to appropriate the public money raised by the other part.

Then, referring to the extent this right may be carried, he says:

It is contended on the one side that, as the National Government is a government of limited powers, it has no right to expend money except in the performance of acts authorized by other specific grants according to a strict construction of their powers; that this grant in neither of its branches gives to Congress a discretionary power of any kind, but is a mere instrument in its hands to carry into effect the powers contained in the other grants. To this construction I was inclined in the more early stage of our Government, but on further reflection and observation my mind has undergone a change.

The reasons for this change of opinion he then proceeds to unfold so clearly and so forcibly as to place the matter beyond all question. Among these reasons he states the following:

Many considerations of great weight operate in favor of this construction, while I do not perceive any serious objection to it. If it be established, it follows that the words "to provide for the common defense and general welfare" have a definite, safe, and useful meaning. The idea of their forming an original grant with unlimited power superseding every other grant is abandoned. They will be considered simply as conveying a right of appropriation, a right indispensable to that of raising a revenue, and necessary to expenditures under every grant. By it, as already observed, no new power will be taken from the States, the money to be appropriated being raised under a power already granted to Congress. By it, too, the motive for giving a forced or strained construction to any of the other specific grants will in most instances be diminished and in many utterly destroyed. The importance of this consideration can not be too highly estimated, since, in addition to the examples already given, it ought particularly to be recollected that to whatever extent any specific power may be carried the right of jurisdiction goes with it, pursuing it through all its incidents.

If, then, the right to raise and appropriate the public money is not restricted to the expenditures under the other specific grants, according to a strict construction of their powers respectively, is there no limit to it? Have Congress a right to raise and appropriate the public money to any and to every purpose, according to their will and pleasure? They certainly have not. The Government of the United States is a limited government, instituted for great national purposes, and for those only. Other interests are committed to the States, whose duty it is to provide for them. Each government should look to the great and essential purposes for which it was instituted, and confine itself to those purposes. A State government will rarely, if ever, apply money to national purposes without making it a charge to the nation. The people of the State would not permit it. Nor will Congress be apt to apply money in aid of the State administrations for purposes strictly local, in which the nation at large has no interest, although the State should desire it. The people of the other States would condemn it. They would declare that Congress had no right to tax them for such a purpose, and dismiss at the next election such of their representatives as had voted for the measure, especially if it should be severely felt. I do not think that in offices of this kind there is much danger of the two governments mistaking their interests or their duties.

The limitation here suggested is not one as to power, but relates to the proper exercise of Congressional discretion in making appropriations, which should be applied to objects of national or general concern rather than to purely local or State purposes.

Mr. Calhoun, in discussing this question in 1817, said:

It is mainly urged that the Congress can only apply the public money in execution of the enumerated powers. I am no advocate for refined arguments in the Constitution. The instrument was not intended as a thesis for the logician to exercise his ingenuity on. It ought to be construed with plain, good sense; and what can be more express than the Constitution on this point? The first power delegated to Congress is comprised in these words: "To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States;" "but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." First, the power is given to lay taxes; next the objects are enumerated to which the money accruing from the exercise of this power may be applied, namely, to pay the debts, provide for the defense, and promote the general welfare; and last, the rule for laying the taxes is prescribed, to wit, that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform.

If the framers had intended to limit the use of money to the powers afterward enumerated and defined nothing could have been more easy than to have expressed it plainly. I know that it is the opinion of some that the words "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare," which I have just cited, were not intended to be referred to the power of laying taxes contained in the first part of the section, but that they are to be understood as distinct and independent powers granted in general terms and are qualified by a more detailed enumeration of powers in the subsequent part of the Constitution. If such were in fact the meaning intended surely nothing can be conceived more bungling and awkward than the manner in which the framers have communicated their intention. If it were their intention to make a summary of the powers of Congress in general terms which were afterward to be particularly defined and enumerated they should have told us so plainly and distinctly, and if the words "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare" were intended for this summary they should have headed the list of our powers, and it should have been stated that to effect these general objects the following specific powers were granted.

But suppose the Constitution to be silent, why should we be confined in the application of money to the enumerated powers? There is nothing in the reason of the thing that I can perceive why it should be so restricted, and the habitual and uniform practice of the Government coincides with my opinion. Our laws are full of instances of money appropriated without any reference to the enumerated powers. We granted by a unanimous vote, or nearly so, $50,000 to the distressed inhabitants of Caracas, and a very large sum at two different times to the St. Domingo refugees. If we are restricted in the use of our money to the enumerated powers, on what principle can the purchase of Louisiana be justified? To pass over many instances, the identical power which is now the subject of discussion has in several instances been exercised. To look no further back, at the last session a considerable sum was granted to complete the Cumberland road. In reply to this uniform course of legislation I expect it will be said that our Constitution is founded on positive and written principles and not on precedents. I do not deny the position, but I have introduced these instances to prove the uniform sense of Congress and the country, for they have not been objected to as to our powers, and surely they furnish better evidence of the true interpretation of the Constitution than the most refined and subtle arguments.

Let it not be argued that the construction for which I contend gives a dangerous extent to the powers of Congress. In this point of view I conceive it more safe than the opposite. By giving a reasonable extent to the money power it exempts us from the necessity of giving a strained and forced construction to the enumerated powers. For instance, if the public money could be applied to the purchase of Louisiana, as I contend it may be, then there was no constitutional difficulty in that purchase; but if it could not, then we are compelled either to deny that we had the power to purchase, or to strain some of the enumerated powers to prove our right.

John Quincy Adams sanctioned this view of the question, and approved of the appropriating authority of Congress to the full extent claimed for it by Hamilton, Monroe, and Calhoun.

General Jackson next had occasion to examine the question in his Maysville veto message, and reached the conclusion that it was settled and concluded by the weight of authority and the uniform practice of the Government, and he declared—

That the public good and the nature of our political institutions require that individual differences should yield to well settled acquiescence of the people and confederated authorities in particular constructions of the Constitution on doubtful points. Not to concede this much to the spirit of our institutions would impair their stability and defeat the objects of the Constitution itself.

This construction, as to the right of appropriation beyond the enumerated powers, asserted by Hamilton, sustained by Monroe, Calhoun, Webster, Clay, and other distinguished statesmen of the past, officially sanctioned by Jefferson and Madison and approved by all the great constitutional writers of the country, has been practically applied by every Congress since the commencement of the Government under the Constitution, and has been acquiesced in by the States for nearly a century.

Mr. President, if any question can be regarded as settled this should be. The right of appropriation to the extent claimed is warranted by the express language of the Constitution, is in harmony with the great purposes for which the Government was ordained and established and which its powers and authority were designed to accomplish, is approved by the unquestioned weight of high authority, and is sanctioned by the contemporaneous and continued practice of the Government, beginning with the relief of San Domingo sufferers in 1794 and extending to the $1,000,000 donated at the close of the last administration to the exposition in the city of New Orleans. Nothing short of an express constitutional prohibition could overcome the conclusive force of these combined considerations.

The nature of the objects which Congress may properly aid in the exercise of this right of appropriation and which may be regarded as the only limitation upon its authority is clearly defined by Hamilton, Monroe, and General Jackson, who agree in saying that the object or purpose aided should not be merely or purely local, but national or general in its character, having some direct relation to the welfare of the nation or to the common interests of the States. What is general or local, national or State, may not always be easily determined. The question regards the quality of the object or character of the work rather than the agencies or instrumentalities by which it is to be accomplished. This was distinctly asserted by General Jackson, who declared that the only inquiry proper to be made is whether the object or purpose to which the money is to be appropriated or applied "is national and conducive to the benefit of the whole, or local and operating only to the advantage of a portion of the Union."

The only limitation upon the authority of Congress to appropriate public funds, says Story, "are those prescribed by the terms of the Constitution, that the objects shall be for the common defense or the general welfare of the Union." The true test is whether the object be of a local character and local use, or whether it be of general benefit to the States. If it be purely local, Congress can not rightfully appropriate money for the object. But if the benefit be general, it matters not whether, in point of locality, it be in one State or several; whether it be of large or of small extent, its nature and character determine the right, and Congress may appropriate money in aid of it, for it is then in a just sense for the general welfare.

It is not pretended that any particular expenditure should be spread over the whole country in order to make it national or to bring it within the meaning of a defense which shall be common or a welfare that shall be general. Congress expends money in the erection of a fort at the entrance of New York Harbor. The improvement and the expenditure are both local, but the purpose is a defense that is common. So with works of internal improvement; the expenditure may be local, while the benefits are general or conducive to the welfare of the whole. If appropriations which directly and immediately assist a part do really and substantially aid the whole, the authority for making them clearly exists. The question, therefore, whether the application of public funds to a given object will or will not promote the general welfare or be conducive to the benefit of the whole is one of policy or political economy rather than of power, which Congress must determine in the exercise of its sound discretion, as the necessities and exigencies of the country may require.

Let us now apply this principle and this test to the subject of national aid to education. Are the benefits to be derived from the general diffusion of knowledge in this country matters of mere local concern? Are the social, political, and industrial evils arising from widespread illiteracy purely local in their character, or do they affect the general welfare of the country and concern the common interests of the States? There can be but one answer to these questions. In respect to what subject or object have the General Government and the States of the Union an interest more common or relations more mutual and intimate than in their common citizenship, on the character and quality of which rest not only the general welfare, but the perpetuity of both governments, State and Federal?

With a citizenship common to both State and National Governments, and freely interchangeable between the States, when the conditions of illiteracy reach such proportions in any considerable number of the States as to be beyond their ability to remedy, the evils and dangers thence arising can not properly be considered as mere local affairs, but become matters of common concern, affecting the general welfare, and render Federal aid for their correction not only wise in policy, but a high obligation, if not an imperative duty. That the Southern States of the Union are to-day in this situation, unable to correct the conditions of illiteracy now prevailing in their midst, under the operation of causes not necessary to discuss, can not be seriously questioned. I shall not go extensively into statistics in showing this, but will content myself with calling the attention of the Senate to a few prominent facts which fairly illustrate the correctness of the statement.

We now expend in Tennessee annually for public-school purposes about $1,000,000. Our scholastic population is over 600,000, with an average daily attendance of about one-third, say 210,000, for a school term of seventy-eight days during the year, while the average compensation of the teachers employed is less than $30 per month. To extend the term of instruction and make provision in school buildings and properly prepared teachers, with adequate compensation, for our unenrolled scholastic population is beyond the present ability of the State. Between 1860 and 1880 our population increased 39 per cent., while the assessed valuation of our property decreased 45 per cent. From 1870 to 1880 our population increased 283,836, while the assessed valuation of our taxable property diminished $42,003,623.

The other Southern States occupy substantially the same position. They have an unenrolled scholastic population numbering over three millions for whom they have not and can not make adequate school provision. Between 1870 and 1880 the aggregate decrease in the assessed value of property in thirteen of those States reached the enormous sum of $411,475,090. In 1884 the white school population of the Southern States was 4,187,384 and the colored school population 2,012,981. Not one-half of the latter were even enrolled, while the actual attendance of both classes did not reach one-third, and for a term of instruction not exceeding three months and in many cases less than that. For the year 1884 these States expended over $16,000,000 for public school purposes.

Mr. BLAIR. Children not enrolled are children who do not attend school at all, for every child who goes to school is enrolled.

Mr. JACKSON. If they had an opportunity and the school was within reach they would attend unquestionably.

But with all our efforts the number of illiterates is on the increase throughout that large section of the country, while the percentage of illiteracy is but slightly reduced. Under this condition of affairs it is trifling with a great question and a great danger to ask or expect an impoverished people to provide the means required to meet existing emergencies which reach and affect the whole country. I need not in this presence pause to contrast our condition educationally with that of the Eastern, Middle, and many of the Western States, or dwell upon the comparative disadvantages which result from unequal school facilities. They are manifest to any thoughful observer; for the fact can not be ignored that education is the underlying agency of all progress, that it carries with it the knowledge that confers power, and that the more widely it is diffused in any State or community the more rapidly will that State or community advance, not only in material prosperity, but in the power and influence which form and mold the public opinion that directs and controls both social and legislative movements. The greatest strength and highest glory of the General Government is to be most certainly reached in the mutual prosperity and equal advancement of the separate States of which it is composed, and the more nearly they can be harmoniously developed, educationally and otherwise, the greater will be the certainty with which they can be brought into active co-operation with each other and with the Federal head.

But passing from these general considerations I invite a brief reference to the three last amendments to the Constitution, which in securing certain results determined by the late civil war have effected important changes in the right of the States over the subject of suffrage, in connection with which illiteracy presents the most serious evils and dangers to both State and National Governments. These amendments abolish slavery and involuntary servitude, and make every man born in the United States and subject to their jurisdiction a citizen both of the United States and of the State in which he resides, and declare that the United States and the States shall not deny the right of suffrage to such citizen on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. They further provide that if these male citizens, twenty-one years of age and upward, are denied the right to vote for any reason except for crime or participation in rebellion, the State so denying the right shall have its representation in Congress reduced in the proportion which those excluded shall bear to the whole number of voters.

By the census of 1880, in the thirteen distinctively Southern States over one-third of the adult male population thus invested with and protected in the exercise of suffrage, the highest and most responsible prerogative of citizens, were illiterates. They hold the balance of power in every Southern State. Individually their means and resources may be scanty, but by union and concentration they might become ample for the accomplishment of results the most disastrous. When we compare the power they might constitutionally wield and would wield if a political convulsion should at any time disjoin them from the salutary influence of the more enlightened elements of society, the question of their improvement or of changing this condition of affairs for the future at once assumes a magnitude difficult to overestimate. For such a crisis, however remote it may appear, it is the dictate of prudent foresight and political wisdom to prepare. The existence of an illiterate voting population is a constant temptation to political corruption. In the efforts that will be made to secure this illiterate vote for party success and party supremacy party politics will inevitably degenerate to its level, party methods will become more corrupt, and party policies more and more communistic and agrarian in their tendency, while private rights and public obligations will be less and less respected and protected. With an illiterate voting population holding the balance of power we will step by step, and as certainly as day follows night or night the day, reach a corrupted suffrage, the "very angel of destruction to elective governments."

As this illiterate citizenship is thus protected by the Constitution in the right of suffrage, which can not be disregarded by the States except upon the condition of thereby reducing their representation in Congress, which reduction in the Southern States would amount to at least one-third of their present representation if these illiterate voters were denied the right of suffrage, why should not the General Government, if it has, as we insist, the authority so to do, aid in preparing them for its wise and intelligent exercise and for the high duties devolving on them in connection with both governments, State and Federal? The evils and dangers of an illiterate citizenship invested with suffrage reach beyond the locality in which that suffrage may be exercised. Their effects are coextensive with both governments whose policies may be thereby affected or controlled.

Under our dual systems of government, with a distinctly dual citizenship, owing allegiance and obedience to both governments in the order of their sovereignty and the supremacy of their laws, why should the burden rest alone upon the States of qualifying this common citizenship for its responsible functions common to each? Corresponding with the duties which this common citizenship owes to each government, there is the obligation of each to protect it and promote its welfare; and the considerations which make it a wise policy for the States to provide educational facilities for those unable to supply them for themselves extend equally to the General Government, and impose upon it the obligation to aid in the work when exigencies arise which render its assistance necessary.

Under such circumstances I regard it an enlightened policy, which should commend itself to every thoughtful mind, that a common government, with common funds, should aid the States in the education and elevation of their common citizens, on whose intelligence and virtue so largely depends the welfare, if not the existence, of both governments. Mr. President, in referring to the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments I do not wish to be understood as claiming that the authority of Congress to make the proposed appropriation is to be, or can be, derived from these amendments. Such is not my opinion. I have referred to them simply to show the relations of the General Government to one branch of this many-sided subject and its obligation, as distinct from legislative power, to make an appropriation authorized and warranted by and under other provisions of the Constitution. The prevailing, and, if the present measure of relief should fail the prospective, conditions of illiteracy have important social and industrial bearings and relations which concern the general welfare, and which might well claim the attention and justify the General Government's assistance and co-operation with the States in the effort to improve; but I can not now enter upon these aspects of the subject, having already occupied so much of the time of the Senate.

Mr. President, I rest my support of this bill on these propositions: That the General Government, under the Constitution, has the right to appropriate money for objects and purposes affecting or promoting the general welfare beyond the specifically enumerated powers; in other words, that there is a right of appropriation as distinct from the right of jurisdiction and sovereignty. That while the States individually can not by consent or agreement enlarge the powers or extend the jurisdiction and sovereignty of the National Government, they may, however, assent to the appropriation of money within their limits for purposes and objects which do not come within Federal jurisdiction or control. That the present bill involves only their assent to a mere appropriation of money within their limits for the purpose of aiding them in counteracting conditions of illiteracy now prevailing in many of the States to such an extent as to be beyond their ability to remedy. That the evils and dangers—social, industrial, and political—arising from this widespread illiteracy so affect State and national welfare as to warrant and justify national assistance for their correction.

Sir, the associating principle of our Government is protection to all from those evils which are too strong for individual and State exertion. In the application of this principle we are quick to invoke and eager to accept Federal assistance when pestilence or cattle-plague or suffering from flood or famine is abroad in the land. Then, fear for personal safety, apprehensions of property losses, and a public charity that "is gentle and easy to be entreated" call into prompt exercise this great principle of protection from the ills, the evils, and the dangers which individual and State exertion can not readily and successfully encounter or control. But when individual and State efforts and resources throughout a large section of the country have proved incompetent or unequal to the task, and Federal assistance is needed and proposed for the removal of widespread illiteracy—an evil ruinous, mentally and morally, to the individual, hurtful and burdensome to society, productive of disorder, a hinderance to progress and material prosperity, and dangerous to free institutions—the principle is to be discarded and the relief to be withheld on narrow, technical, and long-abandoned constructions of a constitution of government invested with power and authority which were intended to be and which, rightly interpreted, are fully adequate to the accomplishment of all the grand and noble objects for which that government was ordained and established.

Beginning at the second session of the Fifteenth Congress, during the administration of Mr. Monroe, with an appropriation of $10,000 for the instruction of frontier Indian children in reading, writing, and arithmetic, we have proceeded to establish schools for their education, for which regular annual appropriations are now made without question or debate. But when aid for the education of the illiterate citizen youth of the land is proposed, both the authority and policy of extending to them the opportunities and advantages accorded to the Indian is denied.

Regularly, and without question, appropriations are made for the purchase and free distribution of seeds and for the propagation and distribution of food-fishes throughout the country; but when an appropriation is needed to secure the free distribution and the general diffusion of intelligence every imaginable objection, constitutional and otherwise, is interposed to defeat the measure.

For one I shall make no such discrimination against education in the application of national funds.

Believing, as I do, that the education of the children of the country, especially of the manual labor and poorer classes, ought to be free—free as the air they breathe, without money and without price—and that this can not be supplied by the local governments in a large portion of the country, I shall invoke no strict or strained construction of the Constitution to defeat this measure, which aims to accomplish that noble object, so essential to both State and national well-being. Instead of seeking for such objections I shall, on the question of mere aid as now presented, lay down all vague constitutional doubts at the feet of popular education.

Mr. President, this measure may fail, but I esteem it a great personal privilege, as well as a high and patriotic duty, to give it my humble but cordial support; for I am impressed with the conviction that if we would provide against the dangers which no free government has yet survived, if we would make certain the ultimate success of our great political experiment, against which the experience of all history stands arrayed, we must take wiser precautions than any have ever yet taken, by diffusing far and wide among our people that intelligence which will alone constitute the safeguard and protection of our political institutions.

Mr. MAXEY obtained the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas will allow the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States.

Mr. MAXEY. Certainly.

CLAIMS UNDER FRENCH AND SPANISH TREATIES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith, in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 9th instant, a statement showing the payments of awards of the commissioners appointed under the conventions between the United States and France, concluded April 30, 1803, and July 4, 1831, and between the United States and Spain, concluded February 22, 1819, prepared from the books in the Department of the Treasury, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the request of the Secretary of State.

Also, for the further information of the Senate, a report prepared by direction of the Secretary of State from the original records in his custody of the awards made by the said commissioners in claims allowed by them.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, February 16, 1886.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message, with the letter from the Secretary of State, will be printed, and the accompanying letter, which seems to be quite voluminous, will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

FISHING RIGHTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from Texas yield to me for one moment?

Mr. MAXEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. The fishing ventures commence early in March. The passage of the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations will encourage them very greatly and increase their numbers; and as it will not take much time, not more than two hours I should say, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, No. 130 in the Order of Business, may be assigned as a special order for Monday next at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the order of business indicated, which will be reported by the Secretary, be made the special order for Monday next at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not see the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] in his seat. He has been waiting for the disposition of the educational bill, expecting to call up the bill for the admission of the Territory of Washington as a State, and I think he has given notice that as soon as the school bill shall be disposed of he will ask the Senate to consider that bill.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Connecticut, I am satisfied, would not interfere in this matter. It is a matter in which he is largely interested himself, and it will not occupy more than two hours.

Mr. CULLOM. I only wish to make the statement that I desired this morning to ask for a special order myself, and he protested so strongly that I yielded on the question; but having made this suggestion, I have nothing further to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the order of business.

The SECRETARY. A resolution reported by Mr. FRYE from the Committee on Foreign Relations, relative to the appointment of a commission charged with the consideration and settlement of the fishing rights of the United States and Great Britain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to an order that the resolution be made the special order of business for Monday next at 2 o'clock?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not wish to give consent to any matter that can interfere with the regular progress of the bill now under consideration. Of course I apprehend that we shall dispose of the bill certainly this week—I hope to-night. If the friends of the measure will stand by it I should be glad to push it to a conclusion this very night. I certainly shall insist upon asking the Senate to dispose of the measure to-morrow, and I shall ask that it be disposed of to-night, unless there shall be developed such a disposition to discuss it as to make that impossible. I should like to go on at least two or three hours with it to-night and conclude it if possible, but not knowing what contingencies may occur, I do not wish now to give my assent to the proposition of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not object.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from New Hampshire need not withhold his assent, because the unfinished business takes precedence of a special order. If his bill should not be completed at that time it would have priority over the special order.

Mr. BLAIR. The request of the Senator from Maine is for unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be superseded at a certain hour next Monday.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not so understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not so understand the request of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FRYE. No; it is subject to all rules touching special orders.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection then, unless the Senate should not have disposed of the educational bill in the mean time.

Mr. FRYE. I thought I would put it beyond any chance of interfering with the educational bill.

Mr. BLAIR. If it is distinctly understood that the unfinished business will have precedence of the special order I give my consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the rule of the Senate, the Chair understands. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears no objection to the request.

Mr. HOAR. It would be well to put it in by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the request is granted.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to have the unanimous consent include the express affirmation that it is subject to the unfinished business.

Mr. FRYE. I understand that to be the rule.

Mr. HOAR. So do I.

Mr. HARRIS. The unanimous consent only makes it a special order, as I understand, and it is simply entitled to such rights as a special order is entitled to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the request is granted.

SOPHIA B. MOORE.

Mr. VANCE. I ask unanimous consent to have a bill restored to the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. MAXEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. VANCE. A few days ago, when I was not in my seat, the Committee on Claims reported adversely the bill (S. 510) for the relief of Sophia B. Moore, and it was indefinitely postponed. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed will be reconsidered and the bill placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HUDSON, N. Y.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. MAXEY. I yield to anybody.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. If the Senator is about to begin a speech, as I understand he is, I desire to have a message from the other House laid before the Senate for the correction of a bill which has been recalled. It will take a single moment, as it is to correct an error in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Texas yield for that purpose?

Mr. MAXEY. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 637) for the erection of a public building at Hudson, N. Y., returned from the House of Representatives at the request of the Senate.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. At the same time that I moved the request I entered a motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill in order to correct some errors in it, and I now desire action upon the bill for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered?

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading be reconsidered? If there be no objection, the vote is reconsidered and the bill is before the Senate

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I desire now to have the corrections made. It will take but a moment. The chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will present the amendments.

Mr. MAHONE. In line 12, after the words "cost of," I move to strike out the word "fifty" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

Shall not exceed the cost of $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAHONE. In line 16, after the word "of," I move to strike out the words "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

And for the purposes herein mentioned the sum of $75,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in the Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I have on several occasions favored the application of the proceeds of the sales of public lands to educational purposes. All such bills left the disposition of such proceeds exclusively in the States. I do not doubt the power of Congress to devote so much of the public domain or its proceeds as in its wisdom and discretion may seem right for educational purposes, and I think such disposition, within reasonable limits, eminently proper.

The policy was adopted when the grant of the Northwest Territory was made to the United States by Virginia. The title under the ordinance of 1787 passed from Virginia to the United States, and the property became subject to the disposition provided for in clause 2, section 3, Article IV of the Constitution, namely, "the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

Two grants are embraced in this cause: First, to dispose of territory or other property belonging to the United States; second, to make all needful rules and regulations respecting such territory or other property.

The power to dispose of territory or other property belonging to the United States being in Congress without qualification, that power may be exercised according to what Congress may deem sound discretion.

This view has always been taken of the question by Congress. It was applied when the great Louisiana territory was acquired, and the vacant public domain became the property of the United States, to be disposed of like any other property belonging to the Government. The same doctrine has been applied to the Florida public domain and to that acquired from Mexico. It has the sanction of Mr. Jefferson and nearly if not quite all the great statesmen of this country.

The right to apply the public domain to school purposes exists because the property belonging to the United States is under the control of Congress, and by express grant in the Constitution is subject to its disposition. The advocates of the pending bill argue that if Congress can thus apply the public domain or its proceeds it can tax the people to raise a fund for like application. This, to my mind, is a non sequitur. The money in the possession of the people does not belong to the United States. It can not be taken from them except to carry out some power granted to Congress and enumerated on the face of the instrument, and, the purpose of this appropriation not being in furtherance of an enumerated power or necessary and proper for carrying into execution any granted power, such power does not exist.

This argument is attempted to be met by the argument that Congress has the power "to lay and collect taxes, &c., to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States;" and that, this appropriation being for the "general welfare," therefore the power exists.

A more dangerous doctrine—one more subversive of the foundation principles of the Constitution—was never avowed here or elsewhere; and it is to this point that I arose to address the Senate.

I wish first to direct the attention of the Senate to

THE CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF THE TAX CLAUSE.

Shortly after the convention assembled various draughts of a constitution were presented for its consideration. These and all resolutions relating to the proposed constitution were submitted to a committee consisting of eleven members, one from each of the States represented. Of this committee Mr. John Rutledge, of South Carolina, was chairman.

On Monday, August 6, 1787, Mr. Rutledge submitted a report in the nature of a draught of a constitution, and which in fact was the basis of the Constitution adopted.

The first clause of section 1, Article VII, of that report reads:

The legislature of the United States shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.

Here the power was given to Congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises" without qualification, limitation, or restriction. Undoubtedly the committee thought that as the powers of Congress were specifically enumerated in the same report, the tax power would necessarily be exerted in the execution of the enumerated powers; but the convention was not satisfied, and this matter was again referred to the committee. On Wednesday, August 22, 1787, the committee, through Mr. Rutledge, again reported, as follows: At the end of the first clause, first section, Article VII (the one I have just quoted), add: "for payment of the debts and necessary expenses of the United States; provided that no law for raising any branch of revenue, except what may be specially appropriated for the payment of interest on debts or loans, shall continue in force for more than —— years." This again was not satisfactory, and the clause went back to the committee. Finally, on the 4th of September, 1787, Mr. Brearly, on behalf of the committee, reported the following as the form for clause 1, section 1, Article VII, to wit:

The legislature shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

This is the exact wording of the clause as it went into the Constitution and as it stands to-day, with the change of the word "legislature" for "Congress," in order to prevent confusion, the word "legislature" being more generally understood to apply to State Legislatures; and the clause as reported was adopted by the convention nem. con. and without debate.

Why was this form preferred to the others presented? Why were the words "general welfare," as finally agreed on, preferred to the expression "for payment of the debts and necessary expenses of the United States," as found in the amendment reported August 22? Let answer this question. Mr. Madison, justly styled the Father of the Constitution, who as a member of the convention took a leading part in framing it, and afterward, by his articles in the Federalist, was so efficient in securing its adoption by the States, in his letter to Governor Pendleton in 1792, discussing this very expression "general welfare" and the reasons why it was preferred to any other form, says:

It was taken from the Articles of Confederation, where it was always understood as nothing more than a general caption to the specified powers, and it is a fact that it was preferred in the new instrument [the Constitution] for that very reason, as less liable than any other to misconstruction.

How greatly mistaken Mr. Madison was, and how much startled would he have been if he had been in the Senate to-day! I emphasize some of the words in this passage, in order to direct attention to the unmistakable character and force of the evidence.

In the same letter Mr. Madison says:

If Congress can do whatever in their discretion can be done by money, and will promote the general welfare, the Government is no longer a limited one, possessing enumerated powers, but an indefinite one, subject to particular exceptions.

No language can make this point clearer, and no authority can be higher than that of Mr. Madison, for he spoke from personal knowledge, having been an active and able member of the convention which framed the Constitution.

We are clearly told that the expression was adopted because the same expression was in the Articles of Confederation, and had been definitely and uniformly construed as a caption or general heading for the enumerated powers. To the same effect is his unanswerable argument on the same words "general welfare" in No. XLI of the Federalist.

Mr. Monroe, in his eighth annual message, says:

Resting on the people, as our governments do—State and national—with well-defined powers, it is of the highest importance that they severally keep within the limits prescribed to them.

In his special message to Congress, May 4, 1822, Mr. Monroe discusses the tax clause and the true meaning of the expression "general welfare" with consummate and unanswerable power, and he proves that the latter part of the tax clause, to wit, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," was intended to enumerate the purposes to which the money thus raised might be appropriated. And he says:

Such a construction as made the second part of the clause an original grant, embracing the same object with the first, but with much greater power than it, would be in the highest degree absurd. * * * It would in effect break down all the barriers between the States and General Government, AND CONSOLIDATE THE WHOLE IN THE LATTER.

There is the teaching of a man whose Democracy no one can question. It is not the teaching of Alexander Hamilton; it is not the teaching of John Adams. Mr. President, for the first time in my life have I to-day heard Alexander Hamilton and John Adams arrayed as supporting columns to a so-called Democratic measure and to the advocacy of that measure by a Democrat! Shades of Jefferson, deliver me from quoting Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Adams in support of a measure claimed to be Democratic! If gentlemen who used that argument had gone behind what was read from Mr. Hamilton in his report as Secretary of the Treasury back into the convention which framed the Constitution, and had looked at the form of constitution which he read in that body in June, 1787, and avowed himself in favor of, they would have seen that he was in favor of a Congress with absolute power, save and except the mere police regulations, which he was willing to leave to the States, and even then he claimed that Congress should have a revisory power over the action of the State governments, and was in favor of a Senate for life and of a President during good behavior.

I say here and now that it makes no difference what latitudinarian construction you may bring up, you can find authority from Alexander Hamilton in support of it; and when you bring to me as authority on a great measure upon which I am to act the words of John Adams, who thought he found in the Constitution enough to support the alien and sedition laws, I do not accept such authority. I prefer the teachings of such men as Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, James Monroe, Andrew Jackson, and the other great lights recognized by all Democrats as leaders of that party.

But I quote farther. Judge Story, Federalist as he was, was unwilling to go to the extent that gentlemen on the floor do here to-day. Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, treats the latter part of the tax clause as words of limitation and not as a grant of power. His whole chapter on this clause is worthy of the most careful examination. After giving all the arguments pro and con, he gives his own conclusions in section 919, and especially in sections 923 and 926. They are as follows:

SEC. 919. Stripped of the ingenious texture by which this argument is disguised, it is neither more nor less than an attempt to obliterate from the Constitution the whole clause "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States" as entirely senseless or inexpressive of any intention whatsoever. Strike them out, and the Constitution is exactly what the argument contends for. It is, therefore, an argument that the words ought not to be in the Constitution; because if they are, and have any meaning, they enlarge it beyond the scope of certain other enumerated powers, and this is both mischievous and dangerous. Being in the Constitution, they are to be deemed vox et preterea nihil, an empty sound and vain phraseology, a fingerboard pointing to other powers, but having no use whatsoever, since these powers are sufficiently apparent without. Now, it is not too much to say that in a constitution of government framed and adopted by the people it is a most unjustifiable latitude of interpretation to deny effect to any clause, if it is sensible in the language in which it is expressed and in the place in which it stands. If words are inserted, we are bound to presume that they have some definite object and intent, and to reason them out of the Constitution upon arguments ab inconvenienti—

And that is the whole strength of what is called an argument here—(which to one mind may appear wholly unfounded and to another wholly satisfactory)—is to make a new constitution, not to construe the old one. It is to do the very thing which is so often complained of, to make a new constitution to suit our own notions and wishes, and not to administer or construe that which the people have given to the country.

SEC. 923. The whole of the elaborate reasoning upon the propriety of granting the power of taxation, pressed with so much ability and earnestness both in and out of the convention as vital to the operations of the National Government, would have been useless and almost absurd if the power was included in the subsequently enumerated powers. If the power of taxing was to be granted, why should it not be qualified according to the intention of the framers of the Constitution? But then it is said, if Congress may lay taxes for the common defense and general welfare, the money may be appropriated for those purposes, although not within the scope of the other enumerated powers. Certainly it may be so appropriated; for if Congress is authorized to lay taxes for such purposes, it would be strange if, when raised, the money could not be applied to them. That would be to give a power for a certain end and then deny the end intended by the power.

SEC. 926. The argument in favor of the construction which treats the clause as a qualification of the power to lay taxes has, perhaps, never been presented in a more concise or forcible shape than in an official opinion deliberately given by one of our most distinguished statesmen [Mr. Jefferson]: "To lay taxes to provide for the general welfare of the United States is," says he, "to lay taxes for the purpose of providing for the general welfare; for the laying taxes is the power and the general welfare the purpose for which the power is to be exercised. Congress are not to lay taxes ad libitum for any purpose they please, but only to pay the debts or provide for the welfare of the Union. In like manner they are not to do anything they please to provide for the general welfare, but only to lay taxes for that purpose. To consider the latter phrase not as describing the purpose of the first, but as giving a distinct and independent power to do any act they please which might be for the good of the Union, would render all the preceding and subsequent enumerations of power completely useless. It would reduce the whole instrument to a single phrase, that of instituting a Congress with power to do whatever would be for the good of the United States; and as they would be the sole judges of the good or evil, it would also be a power to do whatever evil they pleased."

That is the exact character of a Congress that Alexander Hamilton claimed and was in favor of in the convention which framed the Constitution, and I am not surprised that in his report as Secretary of the Treasury he used arguments which would reach out toward and centralize in the Federal Government the very power that he himself wanted to be in the Congress of the United States; yet we have Democrats who quote Alexander Hamilton as authority to maintain a position which they say is Democratic!

It is an established rule of construction, where a phrase will bear either of two meanings, to give that which will allow some meaning to the other parts of the instrument, and not that which will render all the others useless. Certainly no such universal power was meant to be given them. It was intended to lace them up strictly within the enumerated powers and those without which, as means, those powers could not be carried into effect.

So said Mr. Jefferson. Mr. Jefferson, in his opinion on the national bank, February 15, 1791 (4 Jefferson's Correspondence, 524, 525), after showing that the words "to pay the debts, provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," were designed as a limitation on the tax power in the first or granting part of the clause, says:

It was intended to lace them up strictly within the enumerated powers and those without which, as means, those powers could not be carried into effect.

Here is the whole case in a nutshell.

The Supreme Court of the United States, from its organization all the way down to this time, has asserted in every form of language the doctrine that the Government of the United States is a government of delegated and defined powers. A recent case, in strict line with former decisions, plainly states the relations of the Federal and State governments. In United States vs. Cruikshank et al., 92 United States Reports, Chief-Justice Waite, speaking of the powers of the General Government, says:

Within the scope of its powers as enumerated and defined it is supreme and above the States, but beyond, it has no existence.

Again, in the same case:

The Government of the United States is one of delegated powers alone. All powers not granted to it by that instrument are reserved to the States or the people.

What conceivable object would there have been in "enumerating" and "defining" the powers of the General Government if the words "general welfare" were to supersede or absorb the enumerated and defined powers? The construction is utterly absurd, and outside of these words "general welfare" the pending bill has not even a plausible foothold in the Constitution.

In short, it is conclusive that the power is "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." There and there alone is the tax power. The purposes or objects of appropriation of the money thus raised are "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," or, as Mr. Justice Story aptly puts it, to lay and collect taxes, &c., in order to pay the debts, &c.; and the objects of appropriation, so far as the "general-welfare" clause is concerned, are to execute the enumerated powers in the Constitution. "To pay the debts" is not in any sense a power, but a purpose or object. To provide "for the common defense" is not a power, but a purpose, and to provide for the "general welfare" is not a power but a purpose or object of appropriation, to wit, to excute the enumerated powers; and the whole clause, read in the light of the best authorities, may be written: The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, in order to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and for the execution of the enumerated powers of the Government of the United States.

Now, in all legislation the first question that must be answered affirmatively is, is the proposed legislation constitutional? And if that can be shown affirmatively, the next question is, is it expedient? I deny the constitutional power to enact the pending bill, and if my reasoning is accurate and authorities reliable, I have established the proposition.

The object of the grant of the tax power, as I have shown historically, was to furnish to the Government the means of support, and it had no other object. Therefore it follows that Congress has no power to lay and collect taxes for any purpose save for the support of the Government in the exercise of its constitutional powers, economically administered.

I shall now read what Mr. Jefferson, in his annual message of December 2, 1806, said. A part of what I am going to quote has already been quoted, but I think it is due to the Senate to quote the whole of it. It is in the sixth annual message, December 2, 1806. Mr. Jefferson said:

Shall we suppress the impost and give that advantage to foreign over domestic manufactures? On a few articles of more general and necessary use the suppression in due season will doubtless be right, but the great mass of the articles on which impost is paid are foreign luxuries, purchased by those only who are rich enough to afford themselves the use of them. Their patriotism would certainly prefer its continuance and application to the great purposes of the public education, roads, rivers, canals, and such other objects of public improvement as it may be thought proper to add to the constitutional enumeration of Federal powers—as it may be thought proper to add to the constitutional enumeration of Federal powers. By these operations new channels of communication will be opened between the States; the lines of separation will disappear; their interests will be identified, and their union cemented by new and indissoluble ties. Education is here placed among the articles of public care, not that it would be proposed to take its ordinary branches out of the hands of private enterprise, which manages so much better all the concerns to which it is equal; but a public institution can alone supply those sciences which, though rarely called for, are yet necessary to complete the circle, all the parts of which contribute to the improvement of the country and some of them to its preservation. The subject is now proposed for the consideration of Congress, because, if approved, by the time the State Legislatures shall have deliberated on this extension of the Federal trusts, and the laws shall be passed and other arrangements made for their execution, the necessary funds will be on hand and without employment. I suppose an amendment to the Constitution, by consent of the States, necessary, because the objects now recommended are not among those enumerated in the Constitution and to which it permits the public moneys to be applied.

That is a part of the same message of Mr. Jefferson from which the first part has been read, and in that he distinctly avows the proposition that the power does not exist under the Constitution as it reads, but measures of that kind, he says, must await an amendment of the Constitution before they can be accomplished. The Constitution has never been amended in this regard, and therefore the power no more exists to-day than it did when Mr. Jefferson wrote that message in 1806. I prefer the teachings of Mr. Jefferson very much to those of Mr. Hamilton or Mr. Adams. Says Mr. Jefferson:

The present consideration of a national establishment for education particularly is rendered proper by this circumstance also, that if Congress, approving the proposition, shall yet think it more eligible to found it on a donation of lands, they have it now in their power to endow it with those which will be among the earliest to produce the necessary income.

So I have said and so I have voted and so I say to-day, that so far as lands are concerned you have control over them. Why? Because the Constitution itself says that "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." It is a distinct clause, wholly independent of the tax clause, and not in any wise connected with it.

From this it will be seen conclusively that this greatest of all American statesmen—an open, avowed, and steadfast friend of education—denied the power of Congress to support schools by Federal taxation.

Let me in all modesty warn gentlemen of the same political faith with myself to look well to the consequences of the course they propose.

It is claimed that the South was impoverished by the war, that some four million people theretofore held in bondage had been freed and admitted to citizenship without preparation, and emerging from bondage without property, the entire burden of the education of the colored children fell upon the white people of that part of the Union, who were themselves in straitened circumstances, and that in equity the United States, having freed these people, ought to aid in the education of the colored children.

I admit the force of this argument, and to the extent of the constitutional power of Congress would act upon it, and have acted upon it in bills for appropriating the proceeds of the sale of public lands to this purpose. For that there is clear constitutional warrant. For taxing the people, as this bill contemplates, I am unable to find that warrant, without which I would support no bill, however pressing I might conceive the necessity. Let us never forget the teaching of Mr. Jefferson as to the relations of the State and Federal Governments, as found in his inaugural address, March 4, 1801:

The support of the State governments in all their rights, as the most competent administrations of our domestic concerns and the surest bulwark against anti-republican tendencies.

The preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor as the sheet-anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad.

I beg to call your attention in this connection to the relations of the Federal and State governments to each other.

The States existed as independent sovereignties before the Constitution was ordained and established. They were loosely bound together into a league or compact by the Articles of Confederation. Experience has proven that these were inefficient, and that the perpetuity of the Union demanded the delegation of certain powers to the common government necessary to the good and safety of all.

A convention of the States was called and met in May, 1787, and continued their sessions until September following, when the present Constitution, having been framed by the convention, was submitted to conventions of the States. The Constitution declares that the ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution "between the States so ratifying the same." It was in fact ratified by all the States. What better evidence do you want that the efficient power of the Constitution springs from the States?

Not only was the Constitution submitted to conventions of the States, but the convention which framed it voted by States. The little State of Delaware had as potent a vote in that convention as any of the great States of Virginia, Pennsylvania, or Massachusetts, because, in the language of the Constitution, it was to be the Constitution "between the States so ratifying the same."

The Government of Union ordained and established by the Constitution is a government of delegated or granted powers.

In the very first section of the first article it is declared that—

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

We must therefore look to the Constitution, and not elsewhere, for the powers of Congress; for it is by the powers "herein granted"—that is, in the Constitution—that Congress must be governed. Those words "herein granted" are words of limitation, limiting the powers of Congress to them, extending them to no others; and the eighth section of the same article defines specifically the powers of Congress, and the eighteenth and last clause of that section, so far from sustaining a latitudinarian construction, is itself a limitation on the power of Congress. By that clause Congress possesses the power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

So that it will be seen that there is no implied power in Congress save what may be necessary and proper to carry into execution the express powers vested in Congress and such express powers as may be by the Constitution vested in the Government or in any department or officer of the Government. There is no implied power dissociated from an express power. You must first find the express power, and then whatever may be necessary and proper to carry it into execution is implied.

It has been aptly styled a government of enumerated powers by Mr. Madison, Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Monroe, and a host of other illustrious statesmen, and by the Supreme Court of the United States. So jealous were the States of their rights, that the first ten amendments were promptly ratified, and have always been held, as they were intended to be, conditions precedent to the ratification of the Constitution itself. The tenth amendment reads:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

So that it is perfectly clear—

First, that the powers properly exercisable by the Government of the United States are those "delegated to the United States by the Constitution."

Second. Such powers as are prohibited by the Constitution to the States can not be exercised by them, nor, indeed, can they be by the United States, unless, at the same time that they are prohibited to the States, they are delegated to the United States.

Third. All other powers are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

The Constitution further declares that—

This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.

Here we are taught exactly what is the supreme law—the Constitution itself, laws in pursuance of the Constitution, and treaties under the authority of the United States. Here, as everywhere, the Constitution is guarded. It does not read "laws passed by Congress," but "the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance of the Constitution;" and indeed the Supreme Court has well decided that acts passed in violation of the Constitution are not law.

It is not therefore difficult to reach the just relations between the States and the General Government.

To the extent of the Constitution itself, laws in pursuance of the Constitution, and treaties lawfully made the Government of the United States is supreme. The Constitution is the foundation and limitation of power of the General Government, which constitutionally exercises granted powers only, and save and except these and the prohibited powers, all of which are plainly set ont on the face of the Constitution, all other powers are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

I have thus dwelt on the points I have endeavored to establish: First, because I am fully impressed with the admonition of Mr. Jefferson, that a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles is essential to the perpetuity of free government, and it is necessary to warn the people against the dangers of centralization; second, because a departure from those principles has been the fruitful source of usurped and dangerous legislation. While it is never pleasant to disagree with any gentleman with whom I usually act, and with some of them I now differ, yet I can not yield my conscientious convictions; and while I yield to no man in my devotion to the cause of education, and have proven it by a life-long support of State measures having that end in view, I will never consent to the transfer of this State duty to the General Government, and especilly, as in my view, there is no warrant in the Constitution for this new departure in governmental policy. It has been insisted, that the bill leaves the control of education in the States. Mr. President, it is well to know what we are doing. In the Forty-eighth Congress, when this bill was under consideration, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], supporting the bill, declared that if Congress had the power to make the appropriation, Congress had the power to follow that appropriation and direct the application. It is because this is true that I warn my brethren that they are favoring a measure which centralizes vast and far-reaching power in the hands of the General Government to the detriment of the States and the people.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President——

Mr. PLUMB. Is the Senator from Alabama going to speak on this question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PUGH. I have no speech to make on this bill. I simply desired to make a statement, and as my colleague [Mr. MORGAN] is not in his seat, and as I wish him to hear the statement that I make, I shall defer it until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us take a vote on the bill, Mr. President.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to strike out section 13 of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 13 of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 13. That there shall be appropriated and set apart the sum of $2,000,000, which shall be allotted to the several States and Territories on the same basis as the moneys appropriated in the first section, which shall be known as the school-house fund, and which shall be paid out annually to each State and Territory at the end of the year until said sum of $2,000,000 shall be exhausted, and no longer, to be expended for the erection and construction of school-houses for the use of pupils attending the common schools in sparsely populated districts where the local communities shall be comparatively unable to bear the burdens of taxation. Such school-houses shall be built in accordance with modern plans, which plans shall be furnished free on application to the Bureau of Education, in Washington: Provided, however, That not more than $100 shall be paid from said fund toward the cost of any single school-house, nor more than one-half the cost thereof in any case; and the States and Territories shall annually make full report of all expenditures from the school-house fund to the Secretary of the Interior as in case of other moneys received under the provisions of this act.

Mr. PLUMB. Is the bill now under consideration with a view of passing it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. I understood the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] to say that he desired to speak to-morrow, and it seems to me the whole subject had better be reserved. I wish to say something about the matter myself, and unless the Senator from New Hampshire is in great haste I think probably we had better wait until to-morrow.

Mr. BLAIR. I am not in very great haste myself personally, but we are all aware that public business is very pressing and that we are not making very much progress with this bill or any other measure, and that the session is making more progress than we are. I do not feel justified in assenting to any postponement of the bill or any adjournment at this time. It is only 4 o'clock, and we ought to work two hours longer. We might complete the bill to-night and, as I stated a little while since, if it is possible I should like to do so, but at all events I think we can complete the whole matter to-morrow.

Mr. PLUMB. The solicitude of the Senator for the public business is very commendable, and I therefore suggest that he let the bill be laid aside until the ordinary public business may go forward.

Mr. BLAIR. This is ordinary public business.

Mr. PLUMB. Extraordinary.

Mr. BLAIR. The bill has the right of way; it has been discussed not very laboriously by members of the Senate; it has been before us for some time, and there are other measures that demand attention, so that I feel bound to insist upon a further discussion of the bill now or a vote.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PUGH. I desire to make a correction.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the motion for the purpose of hearing the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PUGH. I desire to correct the statement of the Senator from Kansas that it was my purpose to take the floor to make a speech. I stated distinctly that I had no speech to make, but I felt it my duty as a member of the committee to make a statement to the Senate of the connection I have with this bill. I voted for it on its passage by the Senate in the Forty-seventh Congress in obedience to the instruction of my Legislature, and I desire to state my connection with the preparation of the bill as a member of the Committee on Education and Labor. My colleague [Mr. MORGAN] alluded to the fact that I claimed a part of the paternity of the bill with the chairman of the committee, and I want to make an explanation of what connection I had with the preparation of it. That is the sum and substance of the statement I wish to make.

I want to say to the Senate that the bill now before it, in its machinery, conforms in substance and in principle with the Morrill bill, and that the part I took in the preparation of the bill now before the Senate was to make the machinery of it conform to the Morrill bill, which had undergone thorough examination and discussion in the Senate, and had passed the Senate by a vote of 41 to 6. Among the supporters of that bill were my colleague and the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] who has just concluded his speech. I wish to call attention to two sections in the Morrill bill, which will show that in its machinery it conforms strictly to the machinery of the bill now before the Senate as reported by the Committee on Education and Labor.

Section 6 of the Morrill bill reads:

On or before the 1st day of September in each year the Commissioner of Education, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury as to each State, Territory, and district, whether it is entitled to receive its share of the apportionment under this act and the amount of such share, which shall thereupon be entitled to receive the same. If the Commissioner shall withhold a certificate from either, its share of such apportionment shall be kept separate in the Treasury until the close of the next session of Congress in order that it may, if it see fit, appeal to Congress from the determination of the Commissioner. If Congress shall not at its next session direct such share to be paid, it shall be added to the general educational fund.

The next section reads:

That to entitle any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to the benefits of this act, it shall maintain for at least three months in each year until January 1, 1885, and thereafter four months in each year, a system of free public schools for all the children within its limits between the ages of six and sixteen, and shall, through the proper officer thereof, for the year ending the 30th day of June last preceding such apportionment, make full report to the Commissioner of Education of the number of public free schools, the number of teachers employed, the number of school-houses owned and the number of school-houses hired, the total number of children taught during the year, the actual daily attendance, and the actual number of months of the year schools have been maintained in each of the several school districts or divisions of said State, Territory, or District, and the amounts appropriated by the Legislature, or otherwise received for the purpose of maintaining a system of free public schools.

The difference between the Morrill bill and the bill now before the Senate, known as the Blair bill, is that in the Blair bill the report is made by the governor of the State directly to the Secretary of the Interior, while the Morrill bill required the subordinate officer, the school officer having charge of the school fund, to make the report to the Commissioner of Education, a subordinate officer in the Interior Department, the head of the Bureau of Education. The change in the Blair bill is that the governor makes the report instead of his subordinate, and he makes it to the Secretary of the Interior instead of to the Commissioner of Education, the chief of the Bureau of Education.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senator if he will allow me to say a word at this point?

Mr. PUGH. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. The great difference between the two bills is that the bill to which the Senator has referred as my bill only appropriated the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and the surplus moneys arising from the patent fund.

I think that I have some right to complain of the committee. The bill to which the Senator refers as my bill had already received a large sanction of the Senate and was reported favorably by the Committee on Education and Labor, and yet members of that committee notified me that I could not present it and have action upon it here until after this bill had had consideration, and even after this bill had received consideration I was notified that I could not have their support in getting any action of the Senate until this bill had received action in the House of Representatives. Therefore I think I have some right to complain of the treatment of my bill by the committee.

Mr. PUGH. I intended to notice the difference in the funds appropriated by the Morrill bill and the Blair bill. In reference to the statement of the Senator as to the action of the Committee on Education and Labor upon his bill, I desire to say that at the time his bill was reported by me to the Senate, it was the distinct understanding that it should not be considered before the Senate took action upon the Blair bill, for the reason that by running the two together it might interfere with the success of the Blair bill; that the enemies of the bill might undertake to encumber its passage or embarrass it in some way by having those two bills running together in the Senate; and for that reason the Committee on Education and Labor instructed me to withhold that bill and not to press action upon it until after the final disposition of the Blair bill. That was in the last Congress.

It is true that the Morrill bill appropriated the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and that is made the ground of a difference as to the power of Congress to make the appropriation. So far as I am concerned I do not enter into a discussion of that question. I never could see, as a question of power, what right Congress had to dispose of money in the Treasury arising from the sales of public lands different from its power to dispose of money in the Treasury collected there from taxation. It is a subtlety that my mind can not comprehend; it is a difference that my mind is too dull to take in and see any substance in. President Pierce was unable to see it. He said there was no difference in substance between the power of Congress to appropriate money in the Treasury arising from taxation and to appropriate money in the Treasury arising from the sales of the public lands. Senator Clay, of Alabama, while he was in the Senate, made one of the ablest speeches I ever read upon that subject, in which he demonstrated to my mind that there was and could be no difference in the power of Congress to appropriate the proceeds of the public lands to educational purposes and the power of Congress to appropriate money arising from taxation.

But, Mr. President, the Morrill bill did not stop at an appropriation of the proceeds of the public lands. It appropriated the net proceeds arising from patents, which, according to my recollection, amount to some two millions a year.

Mr. COCKRELL. They never amounted to anything until the last few years, when they have gone to a quarter of a million.

Mr. PUGH. I do not remember what the amount is, but the principle for which I contend is the same on one hundred dollars or one hundred million dollars. The money arising from patents is not a trust fund like the public land fund upon which some of the opponents of this bill undertake to explain the difference between the bill known as the Morrill bill and the one now before the Senate. The Morrill bill appropriated whatever money there might be arising from patents to educational uses, and it is immaterial to the question of power whether the sum of money arising from patents is one amount or another.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to show the vote upon the passage of the Morrill bill appropriating the proceeds of the public lands and the proceeds from patents, with the same machinery in substance to regulate the application and control of the money appropriated as is contained in the bill before the Senate. The yeas were 41, being Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bailey, Baldwin, Beck, Blaine, Blair, Brown, Bruce, Burnside, Call, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Coke, Davis of Illinois, Davis of West Virginia, Dawes, Edmunds, Ferry, Garland, Hereford, Hill of Colorado, Hill of Georgia, Hoar, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kellogg, Logan, McMillan, McPherson, Maxey, Morgan, Morrill, Platt, Pugh, Ransom, Rollins, Teller, Vance, Walker, and Windom.

The nays were 6, namely: Messrs. Jonas, McDonald, Saulsbury, Vest, Voorhees, and Williams.

That is the vote that the Morrill bill received on its passage, and as my colleague alluded to the fact that I had been charged with some of the paternity of the Blair bill—and I do not know where he got that information—I wished to explain that when the Senator from New Hampshire introduced his bill in the Senate it was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and that committee referred the bill to the chairman and myself as a subcommittee. The Senator from New Hampshire handed the bill to me, and I made changes in it to make it conform to the machinery for the application and control of the fund appropriated to the machinery of the Morrill bill, that had undergone thorough examination and discussion in the Senate and met with the approval of forty-one Senators. That is all I desired to state.

It is not my purpose to go into the use that has been made of the power of Congress to make appropriations for different subjects, the only source of power being the same as is exercised in the passage of this bill. My colleague a short time ago offered an amendment to an appropriation bill by which he proposed to have money appropriated to arrest the ravages of the caterpillar. Five thousand dollars was appropriated, and the use that was made of it was to investigate the devastations of the cotton-worm. I can not see that Congress can have the power to arrest the ravages of caterpillars in localities in certain States and not have the power to arrest the ravages of ignorance. One is a local evil; the other is a national peril.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I wish to say in this connection with regard to the origin and previous history of the Morrill bill and the bill now under discussion, that both bills were introduced in the Forty-seventh Congress; both bills were acted upon favorably by the committee and reported to the Senate, and neither of them received action in the Senate or the other branch during that Congress. The Morrill bill was not reported, and so far as I know was not introduced into the Forty-eighth Congress and had no action from the committee. The Morrill bill was one which proposed to appropriate, not the proceeds of the public lands, not the proceeds of the lands together with any part of the fund derived from patents, but it proposed from these sources to make a fund the interest of which was to be annually appropriated, which, of course, for a few years would be of trifling importance; but its friends, of whom I was one, contemplated that it would gradually increase; that from this source and other sources, if there should be contributions from individuals or from public appropriations, there might come to be a large permanent fund, the income of which would be paid over to the various States to be applied in their discretion to the cause of common-school education, and also agricultural education as I recollect.

That was the theory and design of the bill, a bill which for one I should be very glad to see enacted and put into the shape of a law. It was not, however, acted upon in the last Congress, as it was generally I think thought by the friends of such assistance as the National Government might give to the cause of common-school education that one bill at a time was enough. I am not aware that the Senator from Vermont pressed his bill, and I was not aware till just now that he had any feeling that in its management and disposition he had any cause to complain of the committee. Certainly I am a friend to the measure, and would be glad to see it become a law and would be very glad to support it. With a view to the promotion of the purpose that the bill was designed to accomplish, at some future time I shall be glad to support his bill.

Perhaps I may as well at this time—unless some other Senator desires to speak further rather than have the time wasted—say a few words of a general character upon the pending measure. I have come to conceive of it simply as a question of fact to be decided upon the evidence existing in this country as to the necessity of national temporary assistance to the common schools of the States.

So far as the question of the constitutionality of the bill is concerned, I think it has been settled by such an overwhelming weight of authority and such an overwhelming expression of the opinions of the Senate that a man simply idles away his time, unless it is to preserve his own consistency upon the record, in discussing the constitutionality of the measure.

But upon the other question, whether there is any actual necessity for legislation of this character, from the evidence bearing on the subject, I think much may even yet be said. Notwithstanding the force of evidence which is contained in the tabulated matter which is before the Senate; notwithstanding the force that is certainly to be found in the statements of the superintendents of public instruction of every Southern State which are before the Senate, there is continually coming to me in correspondence and through the press, and I doubt not by way of correspondence and other reliable information coming to all the Senators, overwhelming additional evidence of the great necessity of assistance in the education of the children of the country.

If the amount proposed to be appropriated by this bill should be all appropriated and should be distributed, the effect of it would not be to greatly enlarge the school facilities beyond those that actually exist. Every dollar that we propose to give, twice every dollar that we propose to give the first year, which is but $7,000,000, would be necessary in order to give to all portions of our country six months' schooling out of the year for the children. The average period of schooling throughout the Southern States and in some sections of the Northern States, the poorer sections, where schools are shortest, is only about three months; and every man must know that the remaining nine months of the year furnish a sufficient period of time wherein the child may forget nearly all that he has learned. A frequent and prolonged course of study is necessary in order to create an impression on the young mind so that the knowledge received shall become permanently fixed, and thus the schooling that is given become of any real or of any great advantage.

Mr. President, look at the Southern States, to whom the benefits of the bill are to go largely—though I think some portions of the Northern States might well turn attention to themselves; there is not enough of an examination of the condition of the masses at home—but in the Southern States they are now raising about $16,000,000 a year for the support of their schools, and with that $16,000,000 they have an average length of school of not over three months in the year. If we give them in addition to what they now spend $7,000,000, which is the amount the bill really proposes to appropriate, it will not prolong those schools for more than four or, or at the uttermost, five months in the year. It is true that $7,000,000 added to the existing schools will increase them out of proportion as compared with the amount actually expended, because from the $16,000,000 thus raised and appropriated is to be deducted the amount paid for the construction of additional school-houses, for the repair of old ones, and for some other items of expenditure. So the $7,000,000 appropriated, as the terms of this bill require to be appropriated, would be added—all but about 10 per cent. (which would go to the wages of teachers and to educate the teachers)—to the existing funds, so that we should come to have by the addition of this $7,000,000 a prolongation of the school period to perhaps four or four and a half months in the year, which is not so long a period as is needed for the education of the rising population of the country. Six months is the shortest period which should be given to that purpose. Now, suppose that we have $7,000,000 appropriated in this way, we are thus making no provision whatever for the extension of the school system to those districts outside and which now have no schools whatever.

It has been stated in the speech of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] this afternoon that there are about four million children in the Southern States who are not enrolled at all, who are not attending school at all, and we by this bill make no provision for this vast uncultivated class who are outside the present operations of the common-school system, so that the appropriation is a trivial appropriation in comparison with the actual necessity of the country, and yet it is talked of as a mammoth appropriation, as a great bribe to those who may receive benefit from it. But when we come to consider the necessity which exists and the fact that the division of the $77,000,000 is spread over a period of eight years, we find that after all it is not an excessive provision; on the contrary, it is a very parsimonious provision for the actual necessity that exists.

We might make the expenditures of our Government enormous by arrogating all we expect to spend during the next ten years, or even during a single administration. Suppose we pay $300,000,000 a year to carry on the Government; in ten years we have to pay out $3,000,000,000 to manage this Government. Think of it! What an expensive institution it is! And yet, when we come to consider that we pay out less than three hundred million dollars annually and examine the items of appropriation, we find that we are getting on as economically on the whole as we can, and that a great many important public interests suffer for want of proper appropriations.

In this direction there is a vast mass of additional evidence which the Senate might well examine. I do not feel like taking up a great deal of time on the subject, because I have, in the effort to save time, had printed very much of this evidence and very much of the argument that I think proper in maintaining the provisions of the bill. To be sure, it may be that I should have done better if I had consumed the time of the Senate two or three days in laying it before the Senate. I thought I was saving time; and if any one doubts that when the Senate at the last Congress enacted this measure by a three-fourths vote it was justified, he will find the doubt resolved by examining the matter which I placed before the Senate at the opening of the discussion.

I was saying, Mr. President, that there was coming continually additional evidence showing the present great need of the enactment of this bill into law. I will read one letter which comes to me from the board of school directors of a town in Louisiana:

OFFICE OF SECRETARY AND SUPERINTENDENT
BOARD OF PUBLIC SCHOOL DIRECTORS, PARISH OF TERRE BONNE.
Houma, La., February 8, 1886.

DEAR SIR: I take the liberty to write to you on the subject of the educational bill now pending before Congress, known as the "Blair bill." We people down in this little spot of the American Union would hail the passage of your educational bill with joy and gratitude. Among all classes, conditions, and colors of our people—in my parish I speak at least, and I suppose it is so elsewhere—your name and efforts are favorably spoken of.

And he goes on with some comments in regard to the general expression of the people in favor of the pending bill, and then he says further:

It is the interest of the politicians and demagogues to keep the masses in illiteracy so that they may the better play and work upon their ignorance and prejudices, and I am happy to say that in my section a rapid change for the best is taking place among all colors of our people. They are appealing almost on their knees for schools. In my parish there are over five thousand children, white and colored—

I ask the special attention of the Senate to this fact—over five thousand children, white and colored, of school age. Last year our school board established twenty-six schools—one teacher to each school—throughout the parish, of which fifteen were for white children and eleven were for colored children; the schools were kept open five months. This year we hope to be able to open at least thirty free schools—seventeen white schools and thirteen colored schools—and keep them open at least six months. Even with that number of schools—

And to this point I wish to call the special attention of the Senate as bearing on that great region outside of any school privileges whatever:

Even with that number of schools there is not enough for half of the children. We have no school-houses. We have a good corps of teachers, white and colored. Our revenue is from the State and parish only. I hope and trust that your bill will pass. Senator R. L. GIBSON is from my parish and can and will bear out my assertions on the school question. I would like very much to read the debates and see the votes on the final passage of the bill.

With sentiments of high respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,
H. C. SIDNEY.

Senator BLAIR, Washington, D. C.

I have here also letters from the State of South Carolina. Here is a letter from a lady whom I do not know; she is very likely known to the Senators from that State, Mrs. Mary A. Evans. She has written me three letters on the subject, and she authorizes the use of the matter in debate if I think it of importance. She makes a statement in regard to the universal desire among the masses of the people, white as well as colored, for the passage of this bill. She has herself circulated petitions addressed to the Legislature of her State; and where it was supposed by some that there was no general feeling or desire for the enactment of this measure she found the business men, the educated people of all classes anxious indeed for the passage of this bill and ready to sign a petition which she circulated addressed to the Legislature of the State, and as I understand—the Senators will correct me if I am wrong—that Legislature almost unanimously memorialized Congress in favor of the enactment of this bill into a law.

Mr. HAMPTON. I will say to the Senator, if he will allow me to interrupt him, as I do not intend to take any part in this debate, that I think the Legislature of South Carolina unanimously requested that the bill should be passed.

Mr. BLAIR. That was my impression. There is no doubt that all through the South and generally throughout the Northern States the people want this bill to pass; and it is idle for any man to stand up in the Senate or any where else and tell me that the people behind him do not want this bill enacted into a law.

I have here the resolutions of the Teachers' Association of the State of Texas, representing the whole State, unanimously passing the very strongest resolutions in favor of the enactment of this bill into a law, and in their resolutions they set forth in the most forcible language that is conceivable the necessity they are laboring under for this appropriation even in the State of Texas.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. COKE. I will state for the information of the Senator that the teachers of the State of Texas do not represent the people of Texas. The State of Texas is almost solidly Democratic, and the last Democratic convention held in the State denounced this bill and applauded the action of the Senators and Representatives who opposed it.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know what may have been done in Democratic conventions; I would rather take the action of the teachers of the State of Texas as indicative of the desire of the people on the question of instruction in common schools. I am not accustomed to draw my ideas as to the wishes of the people always from the action of Democratic conventions, and I feel very sure that the interruption of the Senator has had no tendency to disprove the assertion which I made that the people of Texas desire the advantages of common-school education. I have before me some matter bearing on this very question that I will take this opportunity to read from a Texas paper:

The following resolutions and remarks were offered at the convention of educators Wednesday by Professor Hogg, of this city:

"THE STATE UNIVERSITY.

"Resolved, 1. That the school system suited to Texas should embrace all arms of the educational service—primary, liberal, technical, and professional—recognizing the labors of the private as well as State institutions.

"Resolved, 2. That, appreciating the desire on the part of the regents and faculty of the State University, the head of our public-school system, to become more closely allied to our lower schools, we commend it to the consideration of our teachers, and to pupils seeking liberal and higher instruction, to prepare themselves to enter the several schools of the same.

"FEDERAL AID.

"Whereas the perpetuity of a government of the people, for the people, and by the people presupposes as an essential condition the education of the whole people; and

"Whereas such education requires an outlay of large sums of money; and

"Whereas since the war our voting population has been largely increased by the addition of six millions of enfranchised citizens; and

"Whereas this has been done at the close of a most disastrous civil war, impoverishing wholly one section of our country: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, 1. That the Texas association of city superintendents assembled in convention do indorse the bill before Congress known as the Blair bill, or some other just and wise measure extending to the whole country Federal aid in behalf of the education of all the children of the respective school ages upon the basis of the illiteracy of the people.

"Resolved, 2. That we request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to vote for such a bill.

"Resolved, 3. That our secretary be instructed to send each member of the Texas delegation a certified copy of these resolutions.

"ALEX. HOGG, Chairman.
"W. A. BANKS.
"D. F. HUGHES."

The resolutions in regard to this matter were sent to me by Professor Hogg.

The resolution in regard to the State University was adopted with but little discussion.

Superintendent Hogg asked and was granted permission, since he had given up his place upon the regular programme upon the subject, "The proper organization of our school system," to explain his position in regard to Federal aid.

Said he: "The great Montecuculi has said, 'If you are preparing for war and expect to become victors, you must have three necessary things: First, money; secondly, more money; thirdly, much more money.' We need," continued Professor Hogg, "in this war that we are waging against illiteracy, 'money, more money, much more money.' Give the sinews of war, and the generals, majors, and brigadiers will be found; that 'the organization of schools'—that competent superintendents would be found by hundreds and teachers by thousands; that there were before him men and women too who only needed position to show their ability to organize.

"That he knew he was espousing a cause unpopular in political circles, but he proposed to show the need of this aid, the justness of it, and the constitutionality of it." He quoted and said, "You can find what I say in a speech made upon the rostrum of his alma mater, the University of Virginia, last July, by Hon. Charles E. Stuart, of Alexandria, Va., an eminent man, where the constitutionality was derived, and he said, 'The father of the Virginia University is also the father of this Republic. The university has been a success. Let us make the Republica success.' He regretted that even Dr. Dabney knew so little about Mr. Jefferson as not to know his connection with the Episcopal Church, that he continued to harp on the hackneyed, threadbare legend, his infidelity—his opposition to the Christian religion.

"But," said he, "that is a dead issue, doctor. Where did the State get the authority to give the sixteen sections to popular education; from where did the constitutional authority come to give $100,000,000 to the agricultural colleges.

"It was a remarkable fact that Senator COKE was the governor receiving this aid for Texas; that he organized the college and put it into actual operation. These institutions are for the select few—still, when the millions of ignorant children beg for bread they are given a stone. The constitutionality of the bill!" Said he, "The opposers of this bill tell you it tends to centralization; it breaks down the authority of the States. It proposes to create in Washington a bureau of control, to send down into our midst their own teachers." Said he, "I ask the association to read the clauses of the bill: 'Section 5. That, to entitle them to receive aid under the terms of this act'—

Referring to the agricultural college act—

'the several States and Territories shall comply with the following provisions: (1) They shall designate the officers to whom shall be paid, and by whom will be disbursed, the sums annually apportioned under this act.'

Said he: "Why do gentlemen try to deceive the public? For my part, I intend to see the children of Texas, of the South, of the whole country, have their proper birthright—an opportunity to be educated. Texas can not do it, and she is the most favored of the Southern States. But last year it was heralded all over the State that the per capita apportionment to the children was an increase of 20 cents—4 per cent. increase on the funds. Nothing was said about an increase in the scholastic population enrolled, to this, of 25 per cent.—an increase of over sixfold."

He goes on with other matter of the same kind and makes a strong demonstration of his views and opinions on the subject. The result of it all was the unanimous adoption of the resolutions. That was a convention of the superintendents of schools. Here he sends to me resolutions of a large convention of the teachers of the State of Texas, which are as follows:

Resolved, That we, Texas teachers and superintendents, thankful that we have the opportunity of studying the relations of education in the different States of the country, at home and abroad, and of meeting and conferring with the representatives of education, rejoice in the aid thereby to be received by ourselves in the introduction of improved methods of administration and instruction.

Resolved, That with hearts full of gratitude for the prospective great fund to be realized in behalf of education in our State, and happy that the present incomes for education are so large, yet we must confess the inadequacy of present means for the immediate necessity for providing new school-houses and paying well-qualified teachers to instruct the children now really in school.

Resolved, That in view of these facts, and in the presence of the illustration of the progress of education in the more favored States, and sensible anew of the embarrassments to education in those States suffering from the largest illiteracy and possessed of the least per capita school fund for immediate use, we Texas teachers embrace this opportunity to offer our profound conviction of the necessity and wisdom of providing immediate national aid for education.

Any one listening to this debate having any knowledge of the condition of this country knows that the opposition at the South to this measure does not come from the masses of the people there; it does not come from the American people as they reside in that section. There are two elements. There are men on this floor who represent the ante bellum condition of things, who are representatives as much to-day as they were before the war of the slave-holding element and of the landed aristocracy of that section of the country; and they know that if this money gets among the common people down there and makes the common-school system efficient there will be an end of that narrow constituency upon which their own little power is planted. It is because their sentiments are anti-republican; it is because the Senator from Alabama who taunted me and spoke of the disgraceful report which I had placed before the Senate is a relic of the ante-war period; it is because he is not republican in sentiment; it is because he does not represent the existing order of things, does not represent the American people or republicanism in its true and large and real sense, that he is here protesting against the constitutionality of this bill and objecting to its passage. He represents a state of things that is passing away. He represents ideas that received their death-blow with the final battle of the war. That is the difficulty with the men who stand up here and contest the constitutionality of this bill and pretend that the people whom they represent are not in favor of its enactment.

Why, Mr. President, the Legislature of Louisiana, a Legislature which represents something that has occurred in modern times, which represents issues that are living to-day, a Legislature which has its eye upon the future rather than upon the past—that Legislature has more than once pronounced unanimously, I think, in favor of the constitutionality and the desirability of the enactment of this bill into law. The Legislature of Mississippi has done the same thing. The Legislature of Alabama, the Senator's own Legislature, has done it unanimously. So I might go on. Other Legislatures have so pronounced, representing the people. The Legislature of South Carolina, as has just been said by one of her Senators on this floor, has done so unanimously. And the people behind these Legislatures demand popular education.

Sir, there is as strong a feeling among the masses of the white people to-day in favor of common-school education as there ever was among the colored population. We all remember the condition of things at the close of the war. We know how the colored population had an idea that education was their real liberty, their real enfranchisement, their real political salvation; and they poured into the schools, established in whatever way they might be; they sought the opportunity to be educated, to learn to read and to write. They were not blessed by the people of the North with proper pecuniary assistance, though they received a great deal of it, it is true; the fact is to-day that that old feeling among the colored people has to some extent passed away with the rising colored population, and in the place of that has come what did not exist at the close of the war, an almost universal enthusiasm among the white population, to whom the common-school system was a stranger before the war, to receive the benefits of that institution.

So it is to-day that both white and colored people, the masses of the people in the South, are desirous not alone of the system, but that it shall receive sufficient of vitalizing force to make it an efficient agency in the regeneration of their condition. It is on account of the existence of facts of this kind that I am particularly anxious that the desire of those people shall be gratified. I am more anxious for the enactment of this bill into a law because it will reach the common people of the Southern country, a thing which is indispensable to be done if we are ever to become a homogeneous and united people, and permanently one nation.

I believe in the constitutionality of this bill. The Senator from Alabama indulged himself in a vast amount of sophistry in regard to the report, in regard to the position of those who favor this bill, and in regard to the construction of the clause of the Constitution relative to the promotion of the general welfare; but the only position which I have ever taken as to the constitutionality of this bill is just this: Unless we have intelligence among the masses of the people it is impossible to establish and preserve a republican form of government. The National Government is one republican in form, and the fathers in establishing the Constitution established of necessity a government, and whether they said anything of education in the Constitution or not, if they established a constitution and a form of government absolutely dependent for existence upon the intelligence of the people, by so doing, by creating a creature republican in form, they made the strongest possible provision that if necessary that government should have the power to educate the citizenship which would constitute the government itself; for the citizens are the government; they are the sovereigns. I have never yet heard a man undertake to reply to that position.

The Senator from Alabama made no such effort, nor has any man in this debate from the beginning to the end ever undertaken to say that education was not the primary and fundamental truth upon which our institutions, national and State, were based; that there can be any government republican in form unless there be intelligence among the masses of the people or among those who constitute the sovereignty, that is, the individual voters. If that is so, when we establish a national government republican in form we assert the power of educating our children who are to become the sovereigns and are that government; and when we undertake by that national government to guarantee governments republican in form to the States, we undertake a national guarantee of education to the citizens of the States who are also citizens of the national government, provided they do not acquire the necessary education and intelligence from any other source.

Mr. President, as I said, nobody has ever undertaken to deny that position. It is no answer to it to suppose that there are various things which might be for the general welfare which we can not constitutionally do, and to point out this, that, and the other foolish thing, that we can not do, that we can not accomplish, and still be within the limits of the Constitution, although it might be best for the general welfare. Granting, in other words, that there are things which might be for the general welfare, which we can not constitutionally do, it is absurd to reason to the other position, that we can not do that which is indispensable to the national existence, and that that thing may not be done under the clause in the Constitution allowing us to provide for the general welfare. If we can not provide for our own existence, of course there is nothing we can do for the general welfare. The first indispensable thing, in order to have any general welfare at all, is the general existence; and it is upon that ground that I place my view of the constitutionality of this bill. Other Senators differ with me, and they have explained their views on this floor. This bill does not necessarily stand upon such ground as that. This bill only undertakes to say that from the funds of the Government may be appropriated, to be used in the States, or by the people of the States, within the States, subject to the conditions that are stated in the bill itself, a certain amount of the public money, to be applied to the general welfare in the education of the children who live in the States. That is the extent to which the bill goes.

I assert that beyond and behind it is the right of the National Government to educate every child that lives within the national jurisdiction if for any reason it becomes an absolute necessity for the Government so to do. It is the last thing I should like to see the Government obliged to do; and yet in self-defense it must have the right so to do. I believe, and there is every reason to believe, that the people of the States will perform this great duty even better than though it were undertaken by the National Government. It is the right to live, the right to be prosperous, the right to be happy, the right to have a future, and the American people are sufficiently intelligent to understand that; and the only reason why to-day the people of the South, as a whole, are not as intelligent as the people of the North, is simply because they have not had the means (although they have subjected themselves to very heavy taxation for the purpose) to educate their children.

We ought to remember how the war left them. We have not known anything of the real ravages of the war at the North. We have there accumulated property of half a dozen generations. They had at the South; but the war came, their labor system was entirely broken up, and in addition enormous masses of property were destroyed, property such as is indispensable to the existence of a civilized community, and they were obliged to replace that property from taxation before they had money left over to educate their children as they ought to be educated.

We helped to create that devastation. We destroyed slavery in the joint effort wherein the resistance of the Southerner was just as necessary as the aggression of the Northerner. In no other way could that institution have been destroyed at all; and it was destroyed for the general good, for the national good; as we all know, it was an institution for which the nation as a nation, the whole people, North as well as South, were responsible. Having accomplished a common good, and the people in that portion of the country which was the particular scene of its devastations being left without property, having to reconstruct society, to reconstruct their institutions and establish a new system of labor among them and make the masses of laborers intelligent, white as well as black—under these circumstances, it being the demonstration of the census and in fact commonly known to all men that they have gone to the very extent of their capacity to bear the burdens of taxation, and yet have not reached the point of the education of their children as a whole, I think there is a moral obligation, I think there is a legal and a constitutional obligation, a national obligation on the part of the whole people to assist our friends at the South temporarily until they are fairly on their feet and can enter on the great race of life with a fair opportunity and a fair chance with their brothers in other and more highly favored portions of the country.

I will take the liberty, since it has come to my possession to-day, to read a little extract from the Daily New Orleans Picayune, a Southern paper, in which the writer treats of the subject to which I am alluding. It is in regard to the speech of the Senator from Alabama in opposition to the bill. The date of the paper is February 13. I suppose everybody knows that the New Orleans Picayune is a paper of some importance, of some note; it has lived for some time, and represents probably something of popular sentiment behind it. The article to which I refer is as follows:

General MORGAN, of Alabama, should have lived in New England two hundred years ago. He is nothing if not puritanic. Four years ago there was an immense flood which swept away the prosperity of the Lower Mississippi Valley before men had fairly realized what was upon them. General MORGAN said in the Senate that if every friend he had in the South lived on these shores he would not vote for the bill—it was for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers—unless it contained a proviso that the money should not be used for the purpose of leveeing to protect private property. "We have no right to do it under the laws of the United States or the Constitution. Sir, when I find that barrier standing in front of me I stop; I do not go hunting about with microscopic eye to see if I can not find some word or phrase or some hidden meaning in some sentence of the Constitution to justify me in doing that which I very much desire to do." That did not fool anybody. If Senator MORGAN had even a little desire to do what the Constitution would clearly justify, to help the valley, he would have found no obstacle to the doing. The Senate was full of practical legislators with a generation of experience who knew that Constitution in every line and in every word. They had no difficulty. But his real desire was to pose as a constitutional lawyer.

The Senate is now listening to MORGAN again on the same old line. He will, perhaps, again say "it is my duty as an American Senator to stop when I find the barrier of the Constitution in my front, and I do stop." It is BLAIR'S education bill which is under consideration; there are four million youths of school age in the South without school facilities, and the whole country is beginning to wake up to the imperative duty of doing something to correct that great evil. The North is full of voices asking why such a bad state of affairs is not terminated by national aid, and the Alabama Senator warns them off, holds up before their astonished eyes "the barrier of the Constitution," and probably before he takes his seat will have declared that if every friend he has in the South is in peril for want of their aid he will reject it.

While this man is on his feet antagonizing a measure designed in the most honorable spirit for the great need of the South, the Northern papers are coming to our office freighted with the friendliest and most sympathetic urgency of advocacy. The Boston Herald of Tuesday, for instance, says: "If, as a matter of fact, the Southern States are unable to give instruction to their children and youth, and will not be able to do so for ten or twenty years to come, and are willing to receive and properly apply national aid, without relaxing any effort of their own, we think the nation is in duty bound to assist them, and should do so in self-defense against the menace of an ignorant suffrage."

This is the warm spirit of appreciation of our needs which is permeating the whole North. The proposed appropriation, which, if it is enacted, will give Louisiana about $4,000,000 for her ignorant children, would go through Congress like a grateful benefaction, amid the applause of all good men, were it not for the headstrong and obstinate opposition of General MORGAN and other strict constructionists. He should remember that he is to render an account to his people of his action in the Senate, and they will not omit from that account the beating back of the donation which is offered by the North, triumphant in the war and flourishing in the fields of the post-bellum peace, to the South, devastated in the war and made almost a desert by the subsequent peace. For this national aid practically bears that aspect; it comes from a Treasury which is filled with the prosperity of the North, a Treasury which would be bare indeed if it were dependent on the poverty of the South. It does not become a Southern man under such circumstances to erect constitutional barriers to keep back the rescuing hand of national beneficence. General MORGAN must not be eaten up with the notion that his reputation for statesmanship is indestructible; if he does not come down off his constitutional hobby it will certainly perish under his pressing spurs.

There is a just debt due the Southern States, and an amendment to this bill will remove all objections. The illegal taxes imposed upon cotton at the close of the war should be returned to the South. The Government had no right to levy any such tax, and the Supreme Court has so declared. As the money can not be returned to the individuals who paid it, let it be returned to the cotton-growing States for educational purposes.

Mr. MORGAN. I will ask the Senator from New Hampshire if that is the paper in New Orleans that advocates female suffrage?

Mr. BLAIR. I presume so. I should think it would be likely to do that; it reads like a very excellent paper. It is the Daily Picayune of New Orleans, Saturday, February 13.

I have here a long letter from the office of the board of education in Wilmington, N. C. It is signed by Charles Miers. It is a very strong appeal for this national aid. The writer labors under the impression that the whole provision is to give aid for teachers, and says it ought to be made for the people at large. I have here a letter from Spartanburg, S. C. It is from William S. Morrison, superintendent of the city schools at that place. I think at Spartanburg is located one of the universities of the South. Speaking of this measure, he says:

I beg you to use every effort in your power to get the bill through this session. I believe its passage would prove beneficial to every section of our country. I know the aid it proposes to give would prove a godsend to the South.

I desire to read a strong, forcible article from the Boston Herald upon this same subject. It was alluded to in the article which I just read from the New Orleans Picayune, and I will read an extract from it as showing its opinion. Somebody in Connecticut has advanced the unaccountable doctrine that assistance to common schools is somehow prejudicial, forgetful of the fact that there is hardly a State that has not a common-school fund larger than the whole amount of this appropriation and the expenditure there is given to the States—forgetful of the fact that our common schools generally depend upon educational funds combined with taxation. He says that the common schools of Connecticut came very near being ruined half a century ago by something like 50 cents or a dollar to each scholar, while the amount expended per capita for the children of Connecticut is, I think, some ten or twelve dollars. At all events in Massachusetts it was between $19 and $20, and the entire amount derived in the way of per capita contribution of the children of Connecticut at that time to the fund—it was a great many years ago—could not have been more than 75 cents or a dollar.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator says that somebody in Connecticut expresses the view. I wish he would allow me to say that it is the opinion of the State board of education there that this bill is unwise.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know in regard to that. I would study it pretty closely before I relied very much on its opinion on such a question as this.

This is an article from the Boston Herald, which I suppose is as good Democratic authority as there is in New England. The New York Evening Post, it seems, has quoted the Connecticut superintendent. By the way, I take occasion to say that so far as I know every, or nearly every, superintendent of public instruction in the United States, and the educators of the United States, all the great conventions, all the methods for the expression of sentiment upon this subject through all the various avenues have disagreed with the board of education or the superintendent of the State of Connecticut upon the advisability of making this appropriation. The Boston Herald discusses the matter in this way:

We do not think the experience of other States which received Federal aid was similar to that of Connecticut. Some of the Western States made excellent use of their land grants, and the income of the United States deposit fund in New York, which is distributed among the schools of the State, has never proved so great a detriment to the cause of education that the people proposed to give it up. The Southern case is not a parallel one, however this may be. In the first place, there never was a time when any of the Northern States was not fully equal to the task of supplying common-school accommodations and instruction to all the children, without outside assistance. The property and the school-houses and teachers increased in regular ratio to the increase of population. Our contemporary will concede that this has not been the case at the South. Emancipation, the act of the nation, added one-third or more to the school population of the former slave States, and that after two-thirds of the property of that region, reckoning the slaves as part of it, had been destroyed by war.

The freedmen and their children had been kept in compulsory ignorance under the authority of the national Constitution, which recognized and protected slavery. It was, therefore, physically impossible for the people of the Southern States to assume the task of educating this mass of ignorance. Rev. Mr. Mayo, an excellent authority on this question, says that "there are now in sixteen Southern States, 4,000,000 white and 2,000,000 colored children and youth of school age of whom not one-third can be said to be in any effective school." Seventy per cent. of the negroes over ten years of age are illiterate, and the ratio of illiteracy for blacks and whites alike is increasing. And this in spite of the fact, to which Mr. Mayo bears testimony, that "no people in human history has made an effort so remarkable, all circumstances considered, as the people of the South have done during the past fifteen years, in what they have already done for the schooling of their children." Last year the Southern States raised no less than $17,000,000 for school purposes, of which nearly one-third was for the education of their former slaves. In many of the States the school tax is higher in proportion to the property than in Northern States that maintain a splendid school system. And yet more than one-half the children of school age are growing up illiterate, or without primary instruction that is worthy of the name.

If the Senate will bear with me I will in this connection introduce a short address by Mr. Mayo upon this precise question as part of my remarks, in order that Senators may see it in the RECORD. Mr. Mayo, as all know, has spent quite a number of years—some five or six at least—in traveling through the South, especially devoting his attention to the interests of the common schools. There is no State through which he has not traveled extensively, spending nearly all his time—so far as I know, all his time—in the effort to become thoroughly, radically, if you please, acquainted with the wants of the Southern people with reference to the education of their children.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask, before consent is given for printing that document, how long it is?

Mr. BLAIR. This document is in coarse print, just three columns long.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think there should be some understanding about the extent to which this privilege to print is to be accorded in the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. I can read it.

Mr. HAWLEY. The rule of the Senate is not that of the other House by any means. We have not been in the habit of giving leave to print long speeches without having heard them. The Senator the other day put into the RECORD, under this privilege, very easily granted, forty-four pages of solid matter, costly composition, some of it tables, which had all appeared in the RECORD within two years, if I recollect. I do think that was a stretch of the privilege, and I ask merely in this case so that we may not be subject to the same result.

Mr. BLAIR. There is a good deal to be said on both sides of that question.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think not.

Mr. BLAIR. I think there is, and if it were pertinent to the passage of the bill I should try to say something on my side of it, too; but the Senator seems inclined to object to the printing of this matter, and, therefore I will read such extracts as I deem more important.

Mr. ALLISON. Would it suit the Senator to go on in the morning? It is time to adjourn now, and if it would be a relief to the Senator from New Hampshire I will move an adjournment.

Mr. BLAIR. I have only a little more to say, and I would prefer to end what little I wish to say to-day, so that some other Senator can take the floor in the morning. I shall not trouble the Senate more than five, or at the outside ten, minutes longer at this time. Dr. Mayo says in the course of his address:

In every form in which the principle of national aid to education can be presented, under the limitations of the original policy, the whole people, through the General Government, have constantly aided education in the States. The Northwestern and Pacific States owe their present splendid school systems largely to the people's bounty, to say nothing of munificent private gifts from the East. And every State has established industrial education by the nation's aid. To question or turn aside this great central fact in national policy seems to us the cavilling of the advocate rather than the wisdom of the statesman.

If it be asserted that the proposition for national aid to education is novel, we reply, the policy is as old as the nation. If unconstitutional, it has never been questioned in the national courts, and the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court, in a report in the Peabody school fund, has declared the question res adjudicata. If dangerous to State rights, the Government has never attempted this encroachment. Even in war time the Government grants for the freedmen were generally administered by private agencies and State authorities. The last thing this nation will attempt will be to turn schoolmaster. If we are told that such aid demoralizes, we reply that the thirteen Northern States that have received the largest aid have done the most for themselves, and to-day can show the most splendid success in popular education that has been wrought in any age or land. Indeed, the phenomenon of the representative in Congress of any of these States opposing national aid is one of the unsolved conundrums of our strange American politics.

In reference to the condition of the South he says:

For myself, I have been among these people of the South, and know what they are doing. In every Southern State I find opposition, indifference, obstruction of universal education. But in every State the opposition is a decreasing minority, while the school public becomes more intelligent, resolute, experienced, and effective every year. Every Southern State does better, some of the States much better, every year. There has been as much dishonest waste and mismanagement of school funds in several large cities of the Northern States as in the whole South since 1865. The Southern people to-day stand guard over the children's money as no other public money is watched in the country. With proper safeguards I see no peril of serious misuse of national aid.

Bearing upon this point I wish to put into the RECORD a table showing the appropriation by the several States of the amount which they received under the distribution of $28,000,000 of national money in 1836. It shows that nearly every State put that money thus coming from the national Treasury and coming in the form of taxation into their schools, some of them inadvertently, some of them unwisely, in many cases it was lost; but even where it was lost in latter years there has been legislation which restored that fund to the common schools, so that the income from it in nearly every State is at the present time felt in the increasing efficiency of the common schools.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the Senator refer to the distribution of the surplus fund in 1836?

Mr. BLAIR. I do.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think he has published all these tables within a week in the RECORD.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator is quite mistaken. It will not be any use to try to keep the substance of this case out of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD unless it is done by violation of the rules of the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the gentleman is going to be petulant about it I will object to every extension of privilege of every description to him.

Mr. BLAIR. Very well.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am sure I have seen that in his 44 pages which he printed in the RECORD the other day.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator is wrong about that. There is a table published showing the amount that went to each State. The table which I now propose to put in the RECORD, and which I shall read every figure and word if that be necessary to get it there, is a table prepared at my own solicitation, and which no mortal man has ever seen except those engaged in preparing it. It has been nowhere except in my hand since its preparation unless the computers preserved a copy of it. It is a table of items respecting the surplus-revenue deposit of 1837 and the educational use made by each State receiving a part thereof. Then the table shows:

Names of States receiving parts of the deposits.	Amount received.	Remarks as to the educational disposition of the moneys received.

I will read the details as to one State in order that the Senate may see what it is. It contains the enumeration of the States that received the money. I read Alabama as illustrative of what the whole table is: Alabama received $669,088.95, 8 per cent. interest, and since 1877, 4 per cent. annually for public schools; and so I might go through with the whole. If the Senator objects, or if I can not have it printed as part of my remarks I will read it, but, of course, I prefer not to trouble the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have made no objection.

Mr. BLAIR. Then with the consent of the Senator—I thought he would not object when he knew what it was—I shall have this table inserted in the RECORD.

I beg the pardon of the Senator from Connecticut and that of the Senate if I exhibit any warmth in this matter. It has been on my mind a great while. I have endured some taunts and personal abuse in regard to it, which were undeserved, but which I have borne for the sake of the cause. I am willing to bear even more if I can thereby subserve the advancement of this great cause, of the ultimate triumph of which I feel sure.

I will not trouble the Senate longer to-night.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of so much of the Journal as relates to the introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions be omitted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The remainder of the Journal was read and approved.

TESTING-MACHINE AT WATERTOWN ARSENAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of an appropriation for testing-machine, Watertown arsenal, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, submitted by the Secretary of War in lieu of former estimates; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CÆSAR GONDALFO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Customs recommending an appropriation to pay judgment recovered by Cæsar Gondalfo for refund of proceeds of customs forfeiture; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. RHESE indefinitely, on account of the sickness of his father.

SUITS BY UNITED STATES TO CANCEL PATENTS.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back the following resolution with a resolution thereon; and considering the importance of the matter, and in order that the Committee on the Judiciary may consider the business promptly, if the House thinks proper to pass the resolution, I ask on behalf of the committee unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report to the House, accompanying the report by a bill if deemed best—

First. Whether under existing law, and if so under what law, the Attorney-General has authority at the instance and in the interest of private corporations or of individuals, in the name and at the expense of the United States, to institute and carry on or defend against suits to cancel or annul letters patent issued to citizens of the United States under the laws thereof on acconnt of inventions or discoveries, said United States having no pecuniary or other interest therein; and Second. Whether, if said authority exist and its continuance be deemed wise in the judgment of the committee, the law conferring the same should not be made so specific as that parties in interest would be apprised with certainty in what cases and under what conditions they might look to the Government of the United States to undertake the burden of their litigations in that behalf.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HAMMOND. Allow the resolution which the committee report to be read also before the request for unanimous consent is submitted.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred House resolution No. 100, propounding certain questions as to judicial proceedings to vacate letters patent for inventions and discoveries, with a view to know whether the law in that regard needs amendment, and if so, what amendment, have had the same under consideration, and because of the importance of the subject suggest the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be required to answer the questions by said resolution No. 100 propounded, and advise the House as to the present state of the law on said subject, and report any amendment deemed needful, if they find that the law in that regard needs amendment, and that the committee may report at any time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Chair understands that this second resolution, reported by the committee, refers to the resolution referred originally to the committee, and is not a substitute for it, but seems to be an addition to it.

Mr. HAMMOND. That is the intention of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Then it will be necessary to pass both resolutions.

Mr. HAMMOND. That is the motion. Our resolution covers the other, that is, it requires us to answer it; and the resolution recommended by the committee is designed to authorize the Committee on the Judiciary to report upon the present state of the law and what amendments are necessary or needed, so that it covers the other resolution by reference.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the question will be on the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. BURROWS. I suppose this is virtually a motion to recommit with instructions the resolution referred to the committee proposing to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary to make inquiry and report.

The SPEAKER. The committee report back that resolution accompanied by another, which seems to instruct the committee to make the investigation proposed in the original resolution and report to the House such amendments to the law as may be deemed necessary.

Mr. HAMMOND. We have no authority to make the investigation without that authority.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HAMMOND moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The pending question is the consideration of joint resolution (H. Res. 108) authorizing the several Executive Departments of the Government to loan to the North, Central, and South American Exposition at New Orleans certain articles for exhibit, reported from the Committee on Commerce by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. IRION]. The gentleman yielded to his colleague (Mr. BLANCHARD) for fifteen minutes and he has forty-five minutes remaining.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is desirable, in any way consistent with existing laws, and without risk to Government property or expense to the National Treasury, to encourage the effort being made for the development of industry and commercial relations by the North, Central, and South American Exposition at New Orleans, and it be, and is hereby, approved that the heads of the several Executive Departments shall, in whatever respect they may in their judgment see convenient and proper, loan any articles or material suitable to such purpose: Provided, That such loan be made entirely at the expense and on the responsibility of said American Exposition, and shall not be of material needed for use in either Department and shall not in any way interrupt the daily routine of duty or order in any branch of the Government, and shall be returned to the Department, in good order, within one month after the close of the exposition.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I have an amendment which I wish to propose at the proper time to the pending joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. It may.

Mr. CANNON. Then I should like to ask the gentleman to yield to me a portion of the time in opposition to the bill. I should be glad to have ten minutes.

Mr. IRION. I will yield to the gentleman.

This joint resolution was introduced at the request of the commissioners of thirty-one States and Territories. I ask to have read their letter addressed to Captain Buck, director-general.

The Clerk read as follows:

NORTH, CENTRAL, AND SOUTH AMERICAN EXPOSITION,
New Orleans, December 19, 1885.

DEAR SIR: Herewith please find resolutions signed relative to Mr. Hill's mission.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. B. TURRILL, Secretary.

Capt. SAMUEL H. BUCK,
Director-General.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., December 19, 1885.

Whereas the time has arrived when we, as State and Territorial commissioners, in charge at the North, Central, and South American Exposition, can with pride and confidence recommend to the world the wonderful display now in place for inspection, contrast, and study as well worthy a visit by the people of this and other nations; and,

Second, That we learn that the Government exhibit and a part called the "Greely exhibit," that were in this building during the late "World's Exposition," remain unpacked in Washington, and a resolution of Congress is all that is wanting to get them to this exposition, and believing that a resolution of such character as would permit all unpacked articles to be sent to this exposition to be placed where they can be seen would meet the cordial indorsement of the constituents of every Congressman: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the commissioners of the several States and Territories now present at the North, Central, and South American Exposition, That we unanimously request the Congress of the United States to pass such a resolution as will to that body seem meet and proper to the attainment of the end prayed for.

Resolved, That having unbounded confidence in Col. Charles S. Hill, commissioner consular exhibits, Washington city, that this action of our board be sent to him and he be asked to present the same to Congress in order that speedy action may be had in the premises.

Resolved, That the secretary prepare an official copy of the above preamble and resolutions, and that when so prepared the same shall be signed by each commissioner and referred to the director-general for such further action as the board of management may deem best, and then forwarded to Washington, D. C.

Wm. B. Sloan, Commissioner for New Mexico; F. M. Murphy, Commissioner for Arizona; L. Metesser, Commissioner for Indiana; William Bullitt, assistant Commissioner for Louisiana; S. J. T. Johnson, Commissioner for Texas; D. McRae, Commissioner for Arkansas; Wm. J. Demarest, Assistant Commissioner for New Jersey; J. B. Mead, Commissioner for Vermont; J. A. Nichols, Assistant Commissioner for Massachusetts; Olive Wright, Commissioner for Colorado; W. M. Havenor, Commissioner for Nevada; Charles W. Squires, Commissioner for Missouri; Chas. B. Turrill, Commissioner for California; E. W. Allen, Commissioner for Oregon; J. Soulé Smith, Commissioner for Kentucky; Albert Strassburger, Commissioner for Alabama; T. H. Glenn, Commissioner for Illinois; H. S. Fairall, Commissioner for Iowa; Geo. W. Ashby, Acting Commissioner for Kansas; J. B. Ham, Commissioner for Maine; Ramsey Whorton, Commissioner for Mississippi; E. F. Gage, Commissioner for New Hampshire; W. C. Bates, Commissioner for Rhode Island; A. L. Redden, Commissioner for South Carolina; L. B. McWhirter, Acting Commissioner for Tennessee; C. M. Pendleton, Commissioner for West Virginia; A. J. Macnab, Commissioner for Idaho; J. B. Read, Commissioner for Montana; P. E. Connor, Commissioner for Utah; Ezra Meeker, Commissioner for Washington; Homer Merrill, Commissioner for Wyoming.

NEW ORLEANS, December 7, 1885.

DEAR SIR: Learning through Director-General S. H. Buck that official business had called you to Washington, and that while there you would lend your aid toward securing the return here of certain exhibits of the Government which were interesting and instructive features of the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition, the board of State and Territorial commissioners at the North, Central, and South American Exposition desires to express its appreciation of so laudable an effort, and to co-operate as far as in its power to do in accomplishing the desired result. To that end the undersigned were appointed to give expression to the sentiments of the board in that behalf.

It is proper to recall the fact that the North, Central, and South American Exposition is the outgrowth very largely of a feeling shared by every one who saw the World's Exposition at its best estate that the useful objects and purposes of that grand aggregation of the world's products had not been fully accomplished. The plant, one of the finest ever seen, the magnificent exhibits from every part of the earth, and especially from the States and Territories of this Union, presented a spectacle than which none more grand and useful was ever seen. But nearly one-half of the time specified by the act of Congress creating it covering its duration had passed before its perfect state was reached, and the benefits derived from it, though great, were far short of the measure of usefulness it might have achieved had it been completed earlier. This idea was general among the members of the board of the United States commissioners, as was shown by the nearly unanimous vote of that body in favor of holding a similar exposition in 1885-'86.

The North, Central, and South American Exposition, now in progress, comprises in the Government and States building exhibits from thirty-seven States and Territories, and while a few States are absent that were represented last year, others that were absent then are represented now, and most of the exhibits are finer and more instructive than they were a year ago.

The very large space occupied by the Government exhibits last year is nearly covered. A few vacant places only remain, and the return of the exhibits contemplated will fill all the space available. The good accomplished by the exposition of 1884-'85 is visible on every hand. The impetus given to the development of the latent wealth in many directions, and especially of the South, is a constant theme of comment on the part of the press and people, as you are well aware. The main building has rapidly filled since the opening day of the present exposition with commercial exhibits from all parts of this country and from abroad; the exhibits from South and Central America here or on the way will be larger and finer than they were last year, and there can be no doubt that one of the prime objects of this exposition, to wit, extending the commerce of this country with those nations, will be greatly subserved. In order that the results of this exposition may be as useful, interesting, and far-reaching as possible, it is the desire of the board of State and Territorial commissioners to cordially cooperate in all measures which are calculated to secure that object and to second the efforts made to insure the return of the Government exhibits referred to. This board is heartily in accord with you, sir, in your efforts in this behalf, and appreciating the interest you have evinced from the first in this great enterprise, it bids you God speed in your endeavors to promote its success.

Yours, very truly,

T. H. GLENN, Illinois,
JOHN B. MEAD, Vermont,
WM. B. SLOAN, New Mexico,
Committee of United States State Commissioners.

Col. CHARLES S. HILL,
Commissioner Consular Exhibits
North, Central, and South American Exposition at New Orleans, La.

Mr. IRION. It will be seen that these resolutions are offered at the request of the commissioners representing thirty-one States and Territories of the United States, and the only objection made to the passage of the joint resolution making this loan the other day was that the Government of the United States might have to pay the freight on these exhibits back to Washington city.

It seems to me, sir, that that is a very small objection to a request coming from such a large and respectable body as this. But in order to meet that objection, and to show that it should have no weight in the consideration of the resolution, I have since been informed that a contract has already been made with the railroads showing that only one freight shall be paid; that is to say, the freight shall be paid one way before the exhibits leave Washington, and the railroads are then under contract to return them free of charge. So it will be seen that there can be no reasonable apprehension on the part of the United States that there will be any outlay or expenditure of any kind in restoring the exhibits to this city. Besides that, sir, this resolution authorizes and directs the heads of Departments to see that all proper guarantees are taken for the safe return of the exhibits, for their care while in the custody of the association, and that the Government shall be involved in no expense in connection therewith. I do not desire to enter upon a lengthy discussion of the subject, and will therefore yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman from Louisiana, in view of the fact that I can not even briefly state the facts in five minutes, whether he will not consent to yield a longer time to this side?

Mr. IRION. If the time accorded to the gentleman is not sufficient we will willingly extend it.

Mr. CANNON. There are a number of my colleagues who would like to have a little time, and I will ask the gentleman if he can not yield to this side, say, twenty minutes?

Mr. IRION. I will yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman. We have but forty-five minutes of the time remaining altogether.

Mr. CANNON. Still I would suggest to the gentleman that it would seem that the time should be divided evenly; and if it meets his view, I would be very glad if he would so indicate.

Mr. IRION. I am unable, in view of the time promised to other gentlemen, to yield more than fifteen minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to have the Chair call my attention to the fact when I have exhausted seven minutes of the time.

I have had some experience touching appropriations which were made for the Centennial Exposition at New Orleans. I recollect very well that in February, 1883, an act was passed to loan the name of the United States to the World's Cotton Centennial Exposition. That proposition was discussed at length in this House, and gentlemen who were in favor of it were profuse in their statements that in no event would the United States be liable or have one cent to pay on that account, and that they only wanted the name of the Government to give dignity and respectability to the enterprise. That act, Mr. Speaker, was passed, and with a clause in it providing that the President of the United States should issue invitations on behalf of the United States, and that the United States should not be responsible for any expenditure whatever. Sections 7, 8, and 9 of that act were as follows:

SEC. 7. That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act from the Treasury of the United States; and the United States shall not be liable for any of the expenses attending such exhibition or by reason of the same.

SEC. 8. That whenever the President shall be informed by the said board of management that provision has been made for suitable buildings, or the erection of the same, for the purposes of said exposition, the President shall, through the Department of State, make proclamation of the same, setting forth the time at which the exhibition will open, and the place at which it will be held, and such board of management shall communicate to the diplomatic representatives of all nations copies of the same and a copy of this act, together with such regulations as may be adopted by said board of management, for publication in their respective countries.

SEC. 9. That the President be requested to send, in the name of the United States, invitations to the governments of other nations to be represented and take part in said World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition, to be held in some city of the United States, to be hereafter selected as aforesaid.

The invitations were accordingly issued. Afterward, when the buildings were in part completed and the peoples of different nations were already arriving with their exhibits in pursuance of the invitation, the alternative was presented to Congress of allowing the exposition to fail or to loan to the exposition $1,000,000, which it was represented would be repaid. So, rather than to have the Government disgraced, the act of May 21, 1884, was passed providing for said loan and that the proceeds of the exposition after the payment of current expenses of administration should be applied to the repayment of the loan. We supposed that would be the end of it. But not so. On July 7, 1884, another act was passed providing that the Government should furnish an exhibit at its own expense both as to preparation, transportation, and care for this exhibit, and we appropriated for that purpose the sum of $300,000. We supposed that would surely be the end; but again not so. On March 3, 1885, this exposition again came and said that many contracts had been made, the construction of the buildings had gone on, that they had debts for that construction after the consumption of the million of dollars which had been granted by the Government due in nearly all the States; that a large part of the world was at the exposition; that this country was largely represented, nearly all the States were present, and the alternative was presented to make a further appropriation of $335,000 or see a failure. Mechanics' liens were to be enforced; there were the foreign exhibitors; there were debts due for material which had been furnished and for which no payments had been made; and again we were confronted with disgrace to the General Government, having loaned its name to the exposition, or vote an appropriation of $335,000 to pay these debts. We voted that appropriation, but tried to guard against further loss. What was it? That the debts outside of the State of Louisiana should be first paid out of the $335,000. What was the result? The $335,000 was exhausted and 90 per cent. of the debts for construction and expenditures paid outside of the State of Louisiana, but the debts inside of the State not paid and 10 per cent. of those outside of the State unpaid.

What is the further result? All the premiums that were to be paid by this exposition are unpaid.

The Secretary of the Treasury writes the following letter as to the expenditure of this appropriation:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 15, 1886.

SIR: In compliance with the request of the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, I have the honor to inform you that the appropriation made at the last session of Congress for final aid to the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition at New Orleans having proved insufficient for the payment of claims of persons living and doing business outside of the State of Louisiana, which are preferred by the terms of the act of appropriation, the claims for premiums awarded by the exposition have not been considered by the Department. An installment of 74.7 per cent. has been paid by the Department, amounting to $365,642.55, and a second payment of 15 per cent. is now being made, which, with about $15,000 reserved to meet disputed claims, will practically exhaust the appropriation.

Respectfully, yours,

W. E. SMITH, Assistant Secretary.

Hon. J. G. CANNON,
House of Representatives.

Failure again, after the Government has expended $1,650,000 to that exposition. And now the Committee on Commerce comes and reports a bill. What for? That the Government shall loan its exhibits to an exposition at New Orleans, to be held in the same building, under a different name it is true, but nevertheless an exposition at the same place and by the successors of the Cotton Exposition.

Now I am not going to vote for that loan, because I believe it has been demonstrated the Government can not touch an exposition at this point without failure. Ah, but the gentlemen say that these exhibits are to be transported without expense and to be returned without expense, and all that kind of thing. If the exhibits get down there, how do we know they will be returned without expense?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman allow me to answer him?

Mr. CANNON. I will, if the gentleman will yield me as much time as he occupies in his answer.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have no time to yield.

Mr. CANNON. Then I can not yield. How do we know these exhibits will be returned without appropriations being made to pay for them?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. I shall occupy two more minutes.

If I understand correctly this is a sort of international exposition down there. The people of the South and Central American republics and possibly of Mexico are to be present and the people of the United States are to be present at this exposition. And I say that you may write it into this act in the strongest possible manner that in no event shall the United States be responsible directly or indirectly whatever happens, yet when our exhibit goes there, the exhibit of the United States, to the common mind it will be an indorsement by the Government, and I very much fear in the future as in the past they will come and say, "You permitted your exhibits to go there, and the honor of the nation requires that a further appropriation should be made from the Treasury."

This kind of thing was commenced in 1876, the centennial year, when we loaned a million, I believe, or a million and a half. That was paid back in full. In light of subsequent events, notwithstanding it was paid back in full and that a magnificent exposition was held there, I doubt whether that loan was wise, because it appears to have opened the door for a great many other propositions; and they are coming still trooping after. It occurs to me it is time Congress should decline to make further loans or further appropriations.

I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] two minutes.

Mr. ROWELL. It seems to me that Congress can not in any way have anything to do with this exposition without disgracing itself. I remember the statements made on the floor of this House which induced the loan of a million dollars to the exposition at New Orleans. In regard to the amount of money subscribed, I remember a confession in the next session that the statement was incorrect. I remember further that a part of that subscription in New Orleans was so made as to get it all back for the city and more. I remember again a detailed statement of all indebtedness and the amount of premiums presented at that second session, and that we made an appropriation upon that detailed statement and the assurance of the authorities of that exposition that it covered every dollar of the indebtedness due. And yet when we made appropriations covering the indebtedness it only paid 90 per cent., and every dollar of the premiums intended to be provided for is yet unpaid. My own district has some $15,000 awarded and designed to be covered by that appropriation under the statement of its authorities, and not a dollar of the amount has been paid.

Mr. CANNON. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DUNN). Five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. There ought to be, it seems to me, some valid reason given for the passage of this joint resolution. These articles that are to be sent away from the capital belong to the public; they have been procured at the expense of the Treasury; we have here proper places where they should be kept, where it is known to the public that they are to be kept, where many visitors coming to this city desire to see them.

Now, what is the reason for changing their location? Here is an association of men in the city of New Orleans that are engaged in an enterprise to make money for themselves. This is purely a private enterprise for the purpose of pecuniary profit. The profit is to their stockholders who have fallen heirs, through some kind of legerdemain, some kind of chicane, to the appropriations that have heretofore been made. They own the product of these appropriations. Now they want to utilize them, and they want that not only the Government should go to the expense of preparing this exposition but that they should furnish all that makes it attractive or desirable. It seems to me that these gentlemen, who are all proponents of this scheme, would not favor the proviso which I have drawn and which I shall propose to add to this bill, as follows:

Provided, That the articles so sent to New Orleans shall be returned in season for the annual agricultural fairs of the country: And provided further, That any State agricultural fair association desiring the use of said articles for exhibition shall be entitled on request to have such use.

These agricultural fairs are public institutions. They are not organized for private pecuniary benefit. They are not close corporations. They are institutions in which the people of the country generally are interested. In some localities the annual horse-trot does not now draw as it did formerly. [Laughter.] And it would be desirable to have something additional in the way of attractions, and why not let the Government send these exhibits to these different agricultural associations? Why not keep them passing around? Why should New Orleans have all the benefits that flow from the exceedingly liberal expenditures that have been made from the Treasury? I think, Mr. Chairman, that this bill ought not to pass. There is no guarantee provided for the safe return of these exhibits; and, in view of the very many incorrect statements that have been made, or at least the disappointments that the people have suffered in connection with the exposition at New Orleans, gentlemen ought not to feel aggrieved if we do not receive with the utmost credulity all the statements that may be made here with regard to it. Undoubtedly the friends of this bill are prepared to believe, and do believe, that these valuable articles will be returned without cost to the Government; but what guarantee is there? We were told three years ago that if we would vote for a proposition to loan a million dollars to the New Orleans exposition the money would be returned. We were told that if we would give another appropriation of $335,000 it would make the institution a success. Did that make it a success? Did not that exposition become bankrupt? Was it not sold out, and are not the promoters of this new exposition——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. IRION] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. IRION. I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HAHN].

Mr. HAHN. The gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. HEPBURN] asks for a valid reason why this resolution should pass. I will endeavor in the very few moments allowed me to give the House a good and sufficient reason for passing it. The attack that has been made to-day upon the Centennial Cotton Exposition at New Orleans, while just in many particulars, does not in any manner apply to the institution named in this resolution. The Centennial Cotton Exposition, which was in operation in New Orleans a year ago, was an exposition suggested and organized by the cotton-planters of the South. They got up an immense corporation and procured aid not only from the National Government, but also from the State government of Louisiana and the municipal government of the city of New Orleans. There were men and editors in that city of intelligence and public spirit who predicted at the very beginning that the enterprise would be a failure because there were too many leading politicians and State officials connected with it; and it did turn out a financial failure, though in all other respects it was a splendid success. The buildings erected by the management of that exposition were probably the most extensive of any exposition buildings ever erected up to that time in any part of the world. The exhibits which came there from all parts of the United States and foreign nations were unsurpassed and unrivaled by those of any former exposition; and let me say to the House that the people of New Orleans did not make the profit out of that enterprise which the gentleman who last spoke seems to suppose. Every manufacturer in the United States, every exhibitor whose manufactures were on exhibition there and were deserving, got his share of the profits. The trade that was opened up between the Southern country and these Northern manufacturers has continued from that time to this; and there is not a State in the broad Union that has not profited by that enterprise.

When that exposition closed some of the public-spirited people of New Orleans thought it a great pity to have those magnificent buildings torn down and destroyed and sold for old lumber and old iron. Consequently a number of them, without any aid from any government or any political corporation, national, State, or municipal, put their hands in their own pockets and bought those buildings from the former management and paid cash for them. Those gentlemen are now "running" this new institution. They, in common with all the good people in the Mississippi Valley, thought that it was about time to endeavor to open a trade with the Central and South American nations, and they therefore got up this exposition of the three Americas—North, Central, and South America. They have devoted not only their money but their time and their efforts to this enterprise day and night; they have shown commendable energy and vigor, and they do not now ask one cent of aid from this Government. This new exposition is not managed as the former one was, nor by the same men.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAHN (to Mr. IRION). Please allow me two minutes more.

Mr. IRION. I yield my colleague two minutes more of my time.

Mr. HAHN. I was saying, sir, that this institution was not managed as the former exposition was. This exposition may be well described, in the language of the greatest and best man this country ever produced, as an institution "of the people, for the people, and by the people." Now, what are these exhibits that are asked for? They are not in use or wanted at the present time in this city. They consist in part of large charts and maps showing the grandeur and vastness and beauty of this country; some of the articles are souvenirs of the Greely expedition, calculated to arouse a spirit of enterprise, daring, and patriotism in the people, especially the young, who see them. As I have said, they are not in use. They are boxed up in this city. They have been but recently returned from the Louisville or other expositions. They are a superfluity in the Departments. There is scarcely room for them here. They are not even unpacked, and all these gentlemen at New Orleans ask is permission to take these exhibits to New Orleans at their own cost and exhibit them there for one or two months. Some doubts have been expressed by my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] as to whether the exhibits, if loaned, will ever be returned. Why, sir, it is well known that the New Orleans Exposition pays its freight upon articles sent to it before they are shipped to it and before receiving them, or rather when they are shipped; and that freight covers both the going and the coming. Furthermore, the head and front of this institution, its president, is himself a prominent railroad man as well as high-toned citizen, and he will see to it and will pledge his honor that the exhibits are safely returned. Now, sir, suppose the exhibits were there at the end of the exposition, and the United States Government should unfortunately be compelled to bring them back here, the amount will be a mere bagatelle, unworthy the attention of a House like this, which frequently votes $25,000, $50,000, or $100,000 with less debate than this trifling and insignificant measure has called forth.

Mr. IRION. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to say a few words in reply to my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who has intimated that the loaning of these articles to this exposition would be somewhat of an indorsement of the enterprise by Congress, and that those concerned in it might come hereafter with a claim for money. Did I understand the gentleman aright?

Mr. CANNON. I said that former legislation had provided against any responsibility on the part of the Government, yet that the Government had been committed.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I merely wish to state this, which may as well go on record, that at the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia, to which the Government sent exhibits, there was a Government building; and one of the most attractive parts of that exposition was the Government exhibits. Now, the gentleman knows that did not make Congress responsible for one dollar that the Centennial Exposition may have expended. My friend from Kansas has said, "You have the Centennial Exposition here asking back the million and a half of dollars which was refunded." Those people have been here, as they had a right to be, in a dignified way.

Mr. RYAN. I wish to say to my friend that the parties who paid that money in Philadelphia have been here repeatedly knocking at the doors of Congress to be reimbursed.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Not "knocking" much "to be reimbursed." They have been here by memorial and have been heard occasionally by a committee of this House—by the Committee on Appropriations; and they may be here again. If they should come, they have a right to come here. And I give notice now to the House that whenever the persons interested in the New Orleans exposition come here to be reimbursed or to have a dollar of money paid them for any deficiency you will find those interested in the Centennial Exposition asking to be paid back the million and a half dollars which I think was wrongfully taken away from them.

But I rose simply to state that there was no responsibility incurred by the loan to the Centennial Exposition of the articles exhibited by the United States. It did not make the Government responsible in any way; and the proof of this is found in the very fact that that exposition had to pay the million and a half dollars which had been loaned in good faith and which was paid back in good faith. Yet I will not deny the fact that there has been and is a hope that this amount will be reimbursed, as it rightfully should be.

Mr. IRION. I yield three minutes to my friend from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM].

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. CANNON] would have the House understand that this is practically a loan to this exposition either in the shape of money or something that is equal to money. I wish to say for the benefit of the House, and especially of gentlemen who were not here in the Forty-eighth Congress, that when we appropriated $1,000,000 for the benefit of the New Orleans exposition we knew just as well as we knew the sun was shining that we would never get one cent of it back. We appropriated that money with our eyes wide open and understood perfectly well what we were doing. The claim was made that though the Government might never get any of the money back it was a good thing for the benefit of the country to have the exposition in New Orleans.

Mr. Speaker, the present proposition is simply to loan these Government exhibits, many of which are now here in the Departments returned from the former exhibition, having never been unpacked and being all ready to go again. If necessary, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] says, they can go also to other institutions. There is no harm in the United States Government assisting the different States of this country. We need not be afraid of doing something for the benefit of some particular State or section of this common country. I can see no objection to a proposition of this kind, as it involves no expense to the Government. It can not result in any loss to the Government, and does not require the appropriation of a single cent.

I propose, Mr. Speaker, at the proper time to offer an amendment providing with absolute certainty that there shall be no expense to the Government in the transportation of these articles to and from New Orleans, and that a bond be given to the satisfaction of the several Departments that no damage shall accrue to any article loaned, and that the Government shall be guaranteed against any expense whatever.

Mr. IRION. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. NEGLEY.

Mr. NEGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I regret to see that the pending proposition has been made the occasion of unkind criticism of the citizens of New Orleans, and at the same time the advocacy of a system of economy questionable in its application. Taking it for granted that the managers of the exposition at New Orleans had undertaken the accomplishment of a public enterprise beyond their financial ability and disappointing in its pecuniary results, it is unwise to charge them with bad faith. Expositions on as large and liberal a scale as those referred to not only educate our own people in the field of ingenuity, usefulness, and competition, but they advertise our goods to other countries. They perform the service of commercial organizations not only for the interchange of the products of different climes, but they largely assist in developing new markets.

I am told that over twenty nationalities had exhibits in the exposition at New Orleans, and that our manufactures attracted much attention and found many new customers because of their superior finish, greater durability, and cheapness. The necessity for new markets is becoming of greater importance daily, and unless the Government puts forth its whole strength to the accomplishment of this purpose our increasing surplus of both agricultural and mechanical products will become a burden. The entire Northwest, as well as the South, is deeply interested in securing a large share of the commerce of the South and Central American States. France, England, and Germany controlled over two billion dollars in value of the commerce of our near neighbors during the past ten years, while the exports and imports of the United States during the same period did not exceed one-fourth of that amount. Direct water navigation makes New Orleans the center of an enormous traffic with the West Indies and the republics of South and Central America.

Their principal ports lie within a radius of a thousand miles, and there is no good reason why we should not supply their markets with every article they require and foster friendly and reciprocal interchange of commodities. To do this, however, our Government must imitate the liberal, aggressive, and enterprising policy of our competitors.

In conclusion, I hope that the resolution before the House will receive its sanction, especially as the articles are now in packing-boxes, and the Government will be at no expense in having them transported to New Orleans and return.

Mr. IRION. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH].

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, that time is a little too long to say nothing and a little too short to say something. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HAHN] has very correctly stated that there is a large number of articles that might properly be loaned to this exposition. I represented the Interior Department as commissioner in preparing the exhibit for the Centennial Exhibition; and a large part of the exhibit from that and the other Departments consisted of certain pictures and other things illustrating the industrial growth of this country and its resources. Such things are full of interest, are instructive, and are not useful here except to look at.

I am satisfied that the resolution is carefully guarded, so that the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the heads of the other Departments would be charged with the duty of seeing that no articles which would incur risk of injury or loss in transportation or use at New Orleans should be loaned to this exposition. This exhibition and the other are as separate and distinct as two things possibly can be. Yes, not tarred by the same stick. We all know the first exhibit was a failure financially. Otherwise, as the gentleman very properly says, it was an immense success. The exhibition itself was unhappily located at that corner of the universe with an immense swamp on one side and a lake on the other. It was not accessible. Yet as an instructor to-day this country has realized from that exhibition 100 per cent. more than it invested. The present exhibition is an international affair, and this resolution in no sense commits the Government to the payment of a farthing under any circumstances. If we were situated as we were before, and liable to have upon ourselves the obligation of the former law imposed on us in reference to the other exhibition, I should vote against it.

Mr. IRION. In order to bring this matter to a conclusion within the time allotted I now demand the previous question.

Mr. HATCH. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DUNN in the chair). The gentleman from Louisiana has demanded the previous question.

Mr. HATCH. When this matter was first called up this morning I addressed the Chair understanding that I was to have the opportunity to offer an amendment.

Mr. IRION. I will withdraw the demand for the previous question and yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] to offer his amendment.

Mr. DUNHAM. I submit the following amendment, and I ask that it be read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to ask a single question. I notice in the last line the words "and shall be returned to the Department, in good order, within one month after the close of the exhibition." Now, when is it to be closed?

Mr. DUNHAM. If the gentleman will wait until my amendment is read he will find his question will be answered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DUNHAM] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment of the committee by striking out the following words: "Within one month after the close of the exhibition" and insert "on or before July 1, 1886, and to secure the Government against loss or damage to any article loaned, and cover the expense of transportation to and from New Orleans, the Departments shall require a good and sufficient bond."

Mr. IRION. I am willing to accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can not be accepted, but must be submitted to a vote of the House.

Mr. IRION. I now demand the previous question on the resolution and amendments thereto.

Mr. HATCH. I gave notice as soon as this matter was brought up that I had an amendment to submit and it was then understood that I should have the opportunity to bring it before the House. I demand recognition in accordance with that understanding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a question of order, but a question of fact, in reference to which the present incumbent of the chair knows nothing. The gentleman from Louisiana has charge of the bill and his demand for the previous question must be recognized.

Mr. HATCH. The gentleman from Louisiana will find he will get along better with his joint resolution by allowing the amendment to come in of which I have given notice in order that a vote may be taken upon it.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. Would it not be in order for the gentleman from Missouri to offer his amendment and for other gentlemen to offer amendments for the purpose of preventing expense to the Government if the demand for the previous question shall be voted down?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly, and that is the only way to reach the object gentlemen have in view.

Mr. HATCH. Then I hope the previous question will be voted down.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 86.

So the previous question was not ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] for the purpose of offering his amendment.

Mr. HATCH. I submit the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That before either of the heads of the Executive Departments loan to said American exhibition any article or material embraced in this resolution the said American exhibition or some one as principal for it shall execute and deliver to the head of such Executive Department a good and sufficient bond, with approved security, in such sum as the head of such Executive Department may approve, conditioned for the proper care, safety, and prompt return of such articles and materials at a time to be specified in the bond.

The SPEAKER. An amendment is proposed by the committee, and to that an amendment has been submitted by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HATCH. I offer mine as a substitute for that amendment to the amendment.

Mr. IRION. I accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can offer a substitute for that part of the bill which it is proposed to amend.

Mr. DUNHAM. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House an amendment to an amendment may be pending and a substitute for the original text may be pending at the same time.

Mr. HATCH. I offer it as a substitute for the original text of the bill.

Mr. IRION. I now demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion in a moment. The gentleman from Missouri proposes to strike out, as the Chair understands, all after the work "expense," in line 12, and insert what he has sent to the desk.

Mr. HATCH. That is the motion—all after the word "expense."

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question. The Chair thinks it is now in order to demand the previous question, as an amendment has been offered, and a different question is now pending from that which was before the House when the previous question was demanded a moment ago.

Mr. HATCH. But, Mr. Speaker, I have not yielded the floor for the gentleman to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed the gentleman had yielded.

Mr. IRION. I have not yielded the floor at all to the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Louisiana that the gentleman from Missouri was standing in his place from the time the amendment offered by him was read, and the Chair thinks he can not be taken off the floor except by his own consent.

Mr. HATCH. I had not yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, of course, must respect the claim of the gentleman that he had not yielded the floor.

Mr. IRION. But I had not yielded the floor, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yielded the floor when the previous question was demanded. That demand was made, a vote was taken upon it, which of course deprived the gentleman of the floor. The gentleman from Missouri was then recognized, and has not since yielded the floor.

Mr. HATCH. I do not desire, Mr. Speaker, to take up any unnecessary time in the discussion of this resolution. I simply deem it my duty to call the attention of the House to the fact that there is no provision in the resolution for either the care and custody or the safe return of this property to the different Departments of the Government. There is not one single responsibility resting upon this American exposition to either take necessary and proper care of this property of the Government or return it at the proper time; and the amendment I have offered will compel them, before they come into possession of the property, to execute and deliver to the Government a good and sufficient bond for that purpose, and if there is anything in the history of this exposition, it teaches Congress that we ought to demand this bond. I know very well that the persuasive eloquence of the gentleman from Louisiana has lulled the House to sleep heretofore to the tune of about one and a half millions of dollars out of the Treasury.

It is time that this should be stopped. I am willing to go as far to oblige the gentleman from Louisiana and his colleagues personally as any other member on this floor; but in view of the teachings and experience of the three past Congresses to grant this aid to a new organization, that is the legatee of the bankruptcy of the old, without one dollar returned, is a dereliction of duty on the part of the House; and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. PETERS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HATCH. Certainly.

Mr. PETERS. I would like to ask what additional power this joint resolution confers upon the heads of the Departments to what they now have?

Mr. HATCH. It gives them power to demand a good and sufficient bond before this property is turned over to the parties specified in the resolution.

Mr. PETERS. I speak of the original resolution. What additional power or authority is conferred upon them—the heads of Departments—that does not now exist under the law?

Mr. HATCH. I do not understand that the heads of Departments would have any right under this resolution, if it passed the House without the amendment, to demand the bond to which the amendment refers.

Mr. PETERS. I will call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to the first few lines of the joint resolution:

That it is desirable, in any way consistent with existing laws, and without risk to Government property or expense to the national Treasury, to encourage the effort, &c.

Mr. HATCH. Well, is there any existing law conferring upon the heads of Executive Departments the right to demand this bond? I know the gentleman is an admirable lawyer, and I would be glad to have his opinion upon this point.

Mr. PETERS. That is just what I am trying to find out myself.

Mr. HATCH. That is what I want to do; but I want to put it beyond all question, and so I have offered the amendment.

Mr. IRION. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. CANNON. I move to lay the joint resolution and amendments on the table.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 87, noes 61.

Mr. IRION. I demand tellers.

Mr. CANNON. Why not have the yeas and nays at once?

The yeas and nays were ordered, 38 members voting in favor thereof and 55 in opposition.

Mr. DUNHAM. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The hour devoted to the consideration of this business has expired.

Mr. DUNHAM. That is all I wanted.

RETURN OF BILL TO SENATE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read a message from the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, February 15, 1886.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 637) for the erection of a public building at Hudson, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection this bill will be returned to the Senate in accordance with the request of that body.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I desire to renew the request for unanimous consent to have a report made by the Committee on Claims on the bill (H. R. 5314) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to investigate private and domestic claims and demands other than war claims against the United States printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to which was referred bill H. R. 5314, having fully considered the same, submit the following report:

The committee, in the discharge of its duties in the investigation of the large number of private and domestic claims and demands other than war claims against the United States, from the difficulty attending even a partial examination of the great mass of these claims, is deeply impressed with the urgent necessity of immediate legislation referring them to some judicial tribunal where the facts upon which they are based may be thoroughly investigated.

The action of Congress in passing upon these claims is most unsatisfactory; its conclusion is, in almost every case, based on ex parte evidence furnished by the claimant. There are now pending before your committee nearly one thousand bills and petitions. It is estimated that the number will reach eighteen hundred before the close of this Congress. Many of these claims are only for small amounts, while others involve hundreds of thousands of dollars. Nearly all of them require the investigation of disputed facts, a task for which judicial tribunals are especially adapted, a task from which Congress, in the interest of justice and general legislation, should be released. The history of past legislation shows that only a fraction over 1 per cent. of these bills, introduced for the relief of citizens for private and domestic claims against the Government other than war claims, ever pass Congress. It is a practical denial of justice to the citizens having an honest claim against the United States.

In the Forty-eighth Congress nine hundred and thirteen bills and petitions were referred to the Committee on Claims. That committee, composed of honest and able men, was only able to report to the House one hundred and sixty-three—that is, about one-sixth of the bills referred to the committee—only twelve of which passed Congress and became laws. One claimant out of every seventy-six had his demand against the Government finally acted upon. It will not do to say that the nine hundred and one claims that failed to receive Congressional approval were dishonest ones, or that they were less deserving of favorable consideration than the twelve. It is safe to say that nearly all of these claims that failed of allowance in the last Congress have found their way into this, and, with others, have been referred to your committee, presumably for an investigation of the disputed facts, the committee's conclusions, and action of Congress thereon. Judging from the disposition of such bills in the past, there are now more private and domestic claims against the United States before your committee than will be disposed of in the next fifty years under the present system. The citizen who has an honest claim against the Government should not be trifled with; it is a mockery of justice.

Many of these claims have been before almost every Congress for a quarter of a century; a few did service in the First Congress, and are now prosecuted by the great-grandchildren of the original claimants. Of the claims now pending before your committee, many have been favorably considered in one Congress by one House and in another Congress by the other House, without ever reaching the point of a final determination by receiving the concurrent action of both Houses in any Congress; while others which have been rejected are again and again presented to Congress after Congress to take their chances in the legislative lottery.

The committee is of the opinion that every private and domestic claim against the Government in which the facts are not conceded should be referred to a judicial tribunal for an ascertainment of the facts under the rules governing the introduction of evidence in courts of justice. This will protect the claimant who has an honest claim, and prevent the allowance of claims having no merit upon ex parte evidence. It will be conceded that Congress has neither the time nor the disposition to properly investigate and make a finding of fact in each of these private and domestic claims; its province and duty is to provide a judicial tribunal for their ascertainment. This justice alike the Government and the citizen demands.

The Committee on Reform in the Civil Service of the Forty-fifth Congress used the following language in its report, namely:

"From the nature of things, no tribunal can be less fitted to examine and decide upon private claims than the Congress. The organization of the body requires that the consideration of such claims must be first had in committee. The pressure of business is now so great that the claims before the committees are generally allotted for examination to subcommittees of one, or two, or three members. Claimants, therefore, naturally begin by seeking first a favorable committee to which to refer their claims, and next for a favorable selection from that committee to consider them. Evidence is then offered in the form of statements or of ex parte affidavits. There is no answer, usually no personal appearance of witnesses, no cross-examination, no opposing testimony, no inquiry by nor appearance on the part of the Government, no general publicity, no check against fraud, and no prescribed rules and regulations for the investigation. Many of the claims are impressed with a sectional or party character especially calculated to exclude all judicial fairness in their consideration. Every person who has been charged by a committee with the examination of a private claim must have felt how unsatisfactory as a means to justice, even after a most conscientious examination, his consideration of it had been.

"The claim thus considered is reported to the committee, and by the committee to the House. How little time or opportunity the House has for considering those claims, and how liable they are to be determined blindly or partially, we all know. That such a determination of claims should naturally result in great delay and great abuses is unavoidable.

* * * * * * * *

"It is hardly too much to say that a person with a just claim upon Congress might almost as well abandon it as pursue it, and that no one with an unjust claim, if only plausible, persistent, and needy, need be without some hope of success.

* * * * * * * *

"How numerous these cases have become may be seen from the fact that while from the Twenty-eighth to the Thirtieth Congress the private bills and petitions of all kinds averaged only 525 in a Congress—of which the great body belonged to the class for which judicial tribunals have been since established—of late years the number of private bills alone belonging to the exceptional classes, relief for which rests in the discretion of Congress, amount in a session of Congress to about 2,500, or about five for each day Congress is in session. The gross injustice this necessarily occasions to meritorious claimants, and the inducement it offers for the presentation and pressure of groundless and unworthy claims, is obvious."

The evils as well as folly of attempting, or rather pretending, to adjudicate private and domestic claims by Congressional investigation is much more apparent now than in the Forty-fifth Congress. Congress should relieve itself from this judicial work, which it is ever making the pretense of doing, but never completes. It should not delay in referring these claims for judicial investigation as to the facts to some court where the claimant may obtain that hearing and consideration of his demand against the Government to which every citizen is entitled. There were 6,329 private bills introduced in the House during the Forty-eighth Congress. Of this number 682 became laws, of which 588 were pension bills. During that Congress there were but 1,861 bills of a general character introduced. Up to this date (February 13, 1886), there have been introduced in the House 5,554 bills, of which number 3,777 are of a private nature. The cost of printing the bills and resolutions of Congress for twenty years ending June 30, 1881, was $459,740.11. The cost for the five years ending June 30, 1886, will be as follows:

Year ending June 30, 1882	$61,882 74
Year ending June 30, 1883	23,556 08
Year ending June 30, 1884	74,720 26
Year ending June 30, 1885	21,616 33
Year ending June 30, 1886 (estimated)	100,000 00

Making the total cost of printing bills and resolutions of Congress, for twenty-five years, $741,515.52. It is estimated by the Public Printer that bills of a private nature comprise two-thirds of the whole number printed. The proportion of private bills introduced into the House at this session to date (February 13, 1886) is slightly greater than the estimate given.

If the cost of printing bills of a private nature bears the same proportion to the whole cost as their number bears to the whole number, the Government on June 30 of this year will have paid $494,343.68 in twenty-five years for printing bills of a private nature. The cost of printing the bills and resolutions referred to the Committee on Claims in the Forty-eighth Congress was, in round numbers, $8,000, or $666 for every one of the twelve private bills that became laws. Aside from the expenses for printing these private bills, it has been stated "that if the time spent by Congress at every session in the consideration of private and domestic claims was reduced to dollars and cents it would be found that those expenses are equal to the claims allowed, and probably to the sum claimed in those rejected." Yet this condition of things is permitted to go on from Congress to Congress. Bills for the relief of the same party or his heirs are introduced every two years.

The claimant comes and goes and dies, leaving his claim against the United States as a legacy to his children, for if the claimant does not belong to the favored few an ordinary lifetime is far too short to get a claim, however just, through Congress. If it is the policy of Congress to have the facts in each claim before it before passing upon the claim, in order that the citizen in a reasonable time may be paid that to which he is honestly entitled, and to insure the rejection of claims without merit, then Congress should, in the opinion of your committee, pass this bill. But if it is the purpose to continue these private claims from generation to generation, obstructing general legislation, then there should be no change, for the mind of man would be at a loss to suggest any other mode of procedure for passing upon private claims against the Government, under the practical workings of which so little can be accomplished at so great an expense as the present system.

It is fair to assume that Congress is not afraid to trust the judiciary to ascertain the facts and to declare the conclusions of law as to such facts in any controversy, whether it be one between citizens or between a citizen and the United States? It is to be regretted that this Republic of ours should refuse to open its courts to any of its citizens having just demands against the Government. The evils, delays, and injustice of examining and passing upon private claims resulted in the establishment of the Court of Claims to repress a mischief and to advance a remedy. Yet many private and domestic claims can not be prosecuted in that court, they being barred by the statute of limitations. A just claim of the citizen against the Government should not be discharged by time; it should be paid, regardless of its age. The claimant should be given the privilege of going into such court as the Congress shall designate, at least to establish fully the facts upon which he bases the claim or demand.

The other great nations go much farther than is asked by this bill. In the Brown case (6 Court of Claims Reports, 192), Nott, justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, uses this language:

"That the legal redress given to a citizen of the United States against the United States is less than he can have against almost any government in Christendom. The laws of other nations have been produced and proved in this court, and the mortifying fact is judicially established that the Government of the United States holds itself, of nearly all governments, the least amenable to the laws. * * * Of all the governments of Europe, it is believed that Russia alone does not hold the state amenable in matters of property to the law. Of all the countries whose laws have been examined in this court, Spain only resembles the United States in fettering the judicial proceedings of her courts by restricting and leaving the execution of their decrees dependent upon the legislative will. * * * First in the high civilization that protects the individual and assures his rights stands the great empire of the German States."

In England, notwithstanding the principle underlying the English constitution that the king can do no wrong the citizen who has a claim against the government is furnished with a mode of obtaining redress. Mr. Justice Davis, in the O'Keefe case (2 Wall., 183), says:

"The law allows him (the citizen) by petition to inform the king of the nature of his grievance, and as the law presumes that to know of an injury and to redress it are inseparable in the royal breast, it then issues, as of course, in the king's own name, his orders to his judges to do justice to the party aggrieved.

"This valuable privilege, secured to the subject in the time of Edward I, is now crystallized in the common law of England. As the prayer of the petition is grantable ex debito justitiæ, it is called a petition of right, and is a judicial proceeding to be tried like suits between subject and subject. It does not exist by virtue of any statute, nor does the recent legislation in England concerning it do more than to regulate the manner of its exercise and to confer on the petitioner the privilege not before granted of instituting his proceeding in any one of the superior courts of common law or equity in Westminster."

This question received consideration of the Committee on Claims in the Thirtieth Congress. Hon. John A. Rockwell, a distinguished member of that committee, in an elaborate report uses this language:

"The chairman of the committee has obtained from the ministers of several of the leading governments of Europe statements as to the course pursued in claims against the governments of Russia, Austria, and the smaller German States, and in Holland and in other nations. In relation to all mere matters of contract and ordinary trespasses the government is heard in the ordinary tribunals of the country, which are governed precisely by the same rules of law in these cases as between individuals. These governments, although far behind us in civil freedom and constitutional liberty, never shirk from the full and fair investigation of these claims, and always submit to an adverse decision by the courts. It has been left to our own Government to deny to the citizen who has a demand against it the power to try the question before its own courts, and yet has furnished no adequate tribunal for the purpose." (Report No. 498, vol. 3, R. of Com., Forty-eighth Congress, first session.)

The accumulation of private claims has been so great within the last twenty-five years as to burden several of the committees of Congress and to retard action upon a great proportion of the claims referred, at the same time compelling members, elected to participate in the examination and discussion of national subjects, to devote their time to the investigation of these private claims. The committee is confronted with the fact that, work as it may in the ascertainment of the facts upon which the claimants seek redress, it is beyond its power to give anything like a satisfactory examination to but a very small portion of the claims before it. It is also aware of the further fact that but a few of the cases reported will ever receive the consideration of Congress. The liquidation of private claims by Congress time has demonstrated to be expensive as well as dilatory. It should be the wish of every honest claimant, as well as that of the Government, to have the facts in every claim ascertained by a court, after a thorough examination of the witnesses for and against the claims. When the facts are so found, then, and not till then, can Congress satisfactorily or expeditiously pass on the private and domestic claims now pending before this committee.

Although the committee can not suppose that the accompanying bill is the best possible substitute for the present very objectionable system of passing upon claims referred to it, yet it believes that this bill will furnish a remedy for many of the evils complained of; it is at least a step in the right direction. The bill may be obnoxious to the objection that it does not go far enough in affording a remedy to claimants. However true that may be, certain it is that under its provisions the facts will be ascertained under due forms of law, so as to protect the interest of all concerned; that if it becomes a law, and its provisions are strictly adhered to by Congress, it will afford relief now practically denied to those having claims against the Government, and will give members more time to attend to general legislation.

The committee recommend the following amendment to the bill:

"In the ninth line of the first section strike out the word 'finally.' And, when so amended, the committee recommend the passage of the bill."

TARIFF REVISION.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have a large number of protests against the revision of the tariff, which I ask permission to present to the House and have referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

There was no objection.

The protests are prefaced by the following statement:

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives:

GENTLEMEN: In presenting to your honorable body volume No. 2 of protests against tariff revision, I beg to submit, that while volume No. 1 contained the protests of business men from eighteen States of the Union, volume No. 2 contains the names of business men from twenty-eight States, who respectfully and earnestly protest against any revision of the tariff for the reasons herein set forth.

The industrial establishments represented in this volume give employment to 40,500 workmen, who, at an average of only $7 per week, receive $14,742,000 per annum in wages.

Each person, firm, or corporation signing these protests solemnly assures Congress that labor will be compelled to bear a large share of any reduction of duties, and every business man whose signature appears in either volume emphasizes his opposition to any legislation which tends to reduce American labor to the foreign standard, either in price or condition.

With assurance of highest esteem, please believe me, sirs and gentlemen,

Your most obedient servant,

JOHN W. FRAZIER.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., January, 1886.

FOURTH BRIGADE, SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. FINDLAY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to request that House bill No. 2212 be recommitted to that committee together with the report accompanying the bill. This is the unanimous wish of the committee.

Mr. BRAGG. The bill is now on the table.

The SPEAKER. The clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2212) for the relief of the board of field officers of the Fourth Brigade of South Carolina Volunteer State Troops.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland requests that this bill be taken from the table and that it be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, for the consideration of the special order, the bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Military Affairs have considered the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, and reported it back to the House recommending its passage.

Having the honor to be a member of that committee it becomes my duty, by the custom of this House, to state the facts upon which the committee based its action.

When our last Congress adjourned it seemed that the members were thoroughly informed regarding the eventful campaign of August, 1862. Not they alone, but the reading public had become very familiar with these historical events.

Since that time much official correspondence, orders, reports, &c., relating to the campaign have been published by the Government, and every new fact developed adds strength to the now almost universal conclusion that the sentence of the court-martial by which Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter was dismissed from the Army was one of those atrocities which at long intervals disgrace the records of even the most honorable and chivalric nations.

You are all familiar with the military operations in Virginia during the summer of 1862. McClellan had steadily advanced, and on May 31 and June 1 fought the battles of carrying his army nearly within cannon range of the confederate capital. General Jackson, in the Valley of Virginia, had, on the 23d of March, fought General Shields at Kernstown; on the 8th of May encountered and defeated General Milroy at McDowell; on the 23d of the same month had fought the battle of Front Royal; defeated General Banks at Winchester on the 25th, and had achieved a brilliant victory over Generals Shields and Frémont at Cross Keys on the 8th of June, and at Port Republic on the 9th.

These successful operations caused Mr. Lincoln to concentrate the separate armies in Northern Virginia, and on June 26th he issued the following executive order:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, D. C., June 26, 1862.

Order first. The forces under Major-Generals Fremont, Banks, and McDowell, including the troops now under Brigadier-General Sturgis at Washington, shall be consolidated and form one army, to be called the Army of Virginia.

Second. The command of the army of Virginia is specially assigned to Maj. Gen. John Pope as commanding general. The troops of the mountain department, heretofore under command of General Fremont, shall constitute the First Army Corps, under the command of General Fremont; the troops of the Shenandoah department, now under General Banks, shall constitute the Second Army Corps, and be commanded by him; the troops under the command of General McDowell, except those within the fortifications and city of Washington, shall form the Third Army Corps, and be under his command.

Third. The army of Virginia shall operate in such manner as, while protecting Western Virginia and the national capital from danger or insult, it shall in the speediest manner attack and overcome the rebel forces under Jackson and Ewell, threaten the enemy in the direction of Charlottesville, and render the most effective aid to relieve General McClellan and capture Richmond.

Fourth. When the Army of the Potomac and the Army of Virginia shall be in position to communicate and directly co-operate at or before Richmond the chief command, while so operating together, shall be governed, as in like cases, by the Rules and Articles of War.

A. LINCOLN.

Another result of these battles was the discomfiture of the troops under Shields, Frémont, Banks, and Milroy, which enabled General Jackson to withdraw from the valley and join General Lee before Richmond in time to assist in the commencing with Mechanicsville, June 26, followed by Gaines's Mill or Chickahominy, Savage Station, Peach Orchard, Frazer's farm, and ending, July 1, with the desperate battle of Malvern Hill. The Federal commander in this last engagement, and principal actor in most of these battles, was General Fitz-John Porter, who by his skill and intrepidity won more distinction than any other officer of the Army of the Potomac. McClellan having retreated to Harrison's Landing, 25 miles from Richmond, General Jackson hastened to confront the forces under the command of General Pope, whose aggregate strength present for duty in the latter part of June was reported:

First Corps, Major-General Frémont	26,115
Second Corps, Major-General Banks	12,456
Third Corps, Major-General McDowell	25,147
Total	63,718

On July 14 this order was issued by General Pope:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Washington, D. C., July 14, 1862.

To the officers and soldiers of the Army of Virginia:

By the special assignment of the President of the United States I have assumed command of this army. I have spent two weeks in learning your whereabouts, your condition, and your wants, in preparing you for active operations and in placing you in positions from which you can act promptly and to the purpose. These labors are nearly completed, and I am about to join you in the field. Let us understand each other.

I have come to you from the West, where we have always seen the backs of our enemies; from an army whose business it has been to seek the adversary, and to beat him when found; whose policy has been attack and not defense. In but one instance has the enemy been able to place our Western armies in a defensive attitude. I presume that I have been called here to pursue the same system and to lead you against the enemy. It is my purpose to do so, and that speedily. I am sure you long for an opportunity to win the distinction you are capable of achieving; that opportunity I shall endeavor to give you. Meantime, I desire you to dismiss from your minds certain phrases which I am sorry to find in vogue among you. I hear constantly of taking strong positions and holding them; of lines of retreat and bases of supplies. Let us discard such ideas.

The strongest position a soldier should desire to occupy is one from which he can most easily advance against the enemy. Let us study the probable lines of retreat of our opponents, and leave our own to take care of themselves. Let us look before us and not behind. Success and glory are in the advance. Disaster and shame lurk in the rear.

Let us act on this understanding, and it is safe to predict that your banners shall be inscribed with many a glorious deed, and that your names will be dear to your countrymen forever.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

Five days later, July 19, General Jackson reached Gordonsville from Richmond.

On the 26th of July General Pope dispatched General Halleck that Jackson, Hill, Ewell, and Longstreet were at Louisa Court House and Gordonsville. Arrangements were then made to re-enforce General Pope by ordering troops from North Carolina and from McClellan's army.

General Halleck had become general-in-chief on July 11.

The movements of the confederate army soon caused serious apprehensions in Washington, and on July 26 General Halleck visited General McClellan at his headquarters at Harrison's Landing, on James River. General McClellan contended that with 35,000 added to his own army of 90,000 he could advance upon and probably take Richmond, but nevertheless on August 3, a week after Halleck's return to Washington, he ordered McClellan to transfer his army to Acquia Creek. Two days previous to this order he had directed Burnside to move his command to that locality. General Pope pushed his advance across the Rappahannock, and the forces under General Banks were on August 9 attacked by General Jackson at CEDAR RUN, OR SLAUGHTER MOUNTAIN.

The unfavorable result of the engagement and the rumored approach of General Lee caused General Pope to withdraw all his forces from the Rapidan to the left bank of the Rappahannock, and on August 20 the entire confederate army under General Lee occupied its right bank.

While Pope was being re-enforced the confederate army was not inactive. General Stonewall Jackson had marched rapidly up the Rappahannock, accompanied by General Stuart with a large force of cavalry, and on August 22 Stuart, supported by a brigade of infantry, crossed the river at Sulphur Springs, and with his cavalry alone turned Pope's right flank and attacked his immediate rear at Catlett's Station.

Stuart captured Pope's headquarter papers and retreated to the ford, but a heavy rain had so swollen the stream that he could not cross.

General Pope marched to attack General Jackson, who he presumed would cross his entire force at Sulphur Springs. Obstacles encountered caused Pope to countermarch, with the view of crossing below and attacking the forces left by General Jackson opposite his first position. General Pope then learned that the brigade on the left bank of the river, at Sulphur Springs, could not recross; and imagining that it could be easily captured in its isolated position, he retraced his steps northward, only to find that the isolated brigade had succeeded in recrossing the river and had joined the main force of the confederates. General Jackson now marched up the river to Hinson's Mill. On the 25th he crossed, and, by active movements, early on the 26th passed through THOROUGHFARE GAP.

By rapid marches he reached Pope's rear at Bristoe Station, and after doing much damage, moved on Manassas Junction, defeated a brigade of Franklin's corps, which held that place, captured a vast quantity of supplies, of which his hungry and weary troops were greatly in need, and during the 27th utterly destroyed all that he could not use or carry off.

General Jackson was now directly between Washington and the army of General Pope.

General Hooker reached Bristoe Station after the supplies had been burned, and attacked the rear guard of General Jackson as it was retiring toward Manassas. This action was called

THE BATTLE OF KETTLE RUN.

Although Jackson was between General Pope and the Federal capital, it was in Pope's power to put himself between Jackson and the balance of General Lee's army. This he proceeded to do, and on August 27 issued orders which contained these paragraphs:

The following movements of troops will be made, namely: Major-General McDowell, with his own and Sigel's corps and the division of Brigadier-General Reynolds, will pursue the turnpike from Warrenton to Gainesville, so as to reach Gainesville, if possible, to-night.

The army corps of General Heintzelman, with the detachment of the Ninth Corps, under Major-General Reno (General Reno leading), will take the road from Catlett's Station to Greenwich, so as to reach there to-night or early in the morning. Major-General Reno will immediately communicate with Major-General McDowell, and his command, as well as that of Major-General Heintzelman, will support Major-General McDowell in any operations against the enemy.

Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter will remain at Warrenton Junction till he is relieved by Major-General Banks, when he will immediately push forward with his corps in the direction of Greenwich and Gainesville to assist the operations on the right wing.

* * * * * * *

The general headquarters will be with the corps of Major-General Heintzelman until further notice.

With this force General McDowell was expected to cut Jackson off from his retreat through Thoroughfare Gap, or Hopewell Gap, and also make it impossible for Jackson to escape by the more circuitous route marching northward. General Porter reached Warrenton Junction that night, and was in position to re-enforce General McDowell at Gainesville.

On August 21 General Fitz-John Porter had arrived at Acquia Creek with the Fifth Army Corps, reporting 6,926 men for duty. On the 22d he had disembarked, and on that day General Halleck telegraphs General Pope:

Porter's corps is moving up the river to re-enforce Reno at Kelly's Ford.

On the 23d he again telegraphs General Pope:

Reynolds's corps and Porter's advance must be at or near Kelly's Ford, and consequently nearer to you than to Burnside.

And on the 23d General Porter dispatches General Morell:

Reynolds has moved to Rappahannock Station. Go to Kelly's Ford and hold it. Griffin will join you after being relieved by Sykes. Artillery will join you to-morrow. Supplies also go up. Communicate often.

I regret that I have not time to read the orders issued by General Porter to his division commanders, Generals Morell and Sykes, as they certainly afford unmistakable evidence of his extreme anxiety to comply, with the utmost promptitude, with the wishes of his commanders. The same spirit is evinced in his dispatches to his immediate commanding general.

At noon on the 24th General Halleck dispatched General McClellan at Acquia Creek:

Porter and Reno should hold the line of the Rappahannock below Pope.

While in this position, at 11 p. m. on the 26th, General Porter received his FIRST ORDER FROM GENERAL POPE.

It was dated at 7 p. m., and contained a long series of instructions. It directed that on the 27th he should move through Fayetteville to within 2½ miles of the town of Warrenton. Porter replied immediately, saying the instructions would be obeyed as rapidly as possible.

At 4 a. m. on the 27th General Pope writes from Warrenton Junction modifying this order, and directing General Porter to march direct to that place. General Porter complied with this order, marching most of his corps 18 miles, and all of it at least 12 miles, his rearmost regiments reaching their camp at about 10 o'clock at night. At 9.50 p. m., while encamping his troops, General Porter received orders from General Pope, dated Bristoe Station, 6.30 p. m., August 27, which directed him to march with his whole corps at 1 a. m. on the 28th, so as to reach Bristoe Station at daylight.

The order was in these words:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
August 27, 1862—6.30 p. m., Bristoe Station.

GENERAL: The major-general commanding directs that you start at 1 o'clock to-night, so as to be here by daylight to-morrow morning. Hooker has had a very severe action with the enemy, with a loss of about three hundred killed and wounded. The enemy has been driven back, but is retiring along the railroad. We must drive him from Manassas and clear the country between that place and Gainesville, where McDowell is. If Morell has not joined you, send word to him to push forward immediately; also send word to Banks to hurry forward with all speed to take your place at Warrenton Junction. It is necessary, on all accounts, that you should be here by daylight. I send an officer with this dispatch, who will conduct you to this place. Be sure to send word to Banks, who is on the road from Fayetteville, probably in the direction of Bealeton. Say to Banks, also, that he had best run back the railroad train to this side of Cedar Run. If he is not with you, write him to that effect.

By command of Major-General Pope:

GEO. D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Maj. Gen. F. J. PORTER, Warrenton Junction.

P. S.—If Banks is not at Warrenton Junction leave a regiment of infantry and two pieces of artillery as a guard till he comes up, with instructions to follow you immediately. If Banks is not at the Junction instruct Colonel Clary to run the trains back to this side of Cedar Run, and post a regiment and section of artillery with it.

By command of Major-General Pope:

GEO. D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

When General Pope issued this order that a portion of General Porter's troops would not reach camp until 10 p. m.; nor did he know that rain and clouds would obscure the night; nor did he know that between two thousand and three thousand wagons would obstruct the road so as to make it impassable; nor did he know that the railroad would be obstructed by railroad trains. Notwithstanding all this, General Porter issued orders to his division commanders to be ready to march at the hour specified. It was proven on the first trial that Captain De Kay, who brought the order, told General Porter of the wagons and blocked condition of the road. The order was important, and he had traveled with all possible haste, but the condition of the road was such that three hours and twenty minutes had intervened between the date of the order and its delivery, a portion of that time being daylight. And on page 28, court-martial record, we find General Pope states that the two letters which Porter sent to him during the night asking his (Pope's) assistance in having the road cleared of wagons were not received until nearly morning. As these letters left Porter about 10 o'clock they must have been some five hours on the road.

HE DID NOT KNOW

Let me ask this question: If it required three hours and twenty minutes for a single horseman to wind in and out, around and through the wagons, to make the journey, was it possible for an army corps, with artillery and wagons, to make any progress whatever under like conditions? And yet this order contemplated the physical impossibility that Porter's "whole corps" should accomplish the march in three hours, between 1 and 4 o'clock—as the evidence shows it was daylight at the latter hour.

The division commanders protested that compliance was impossible. But Porter says:

This order must be obeyed. General Pope, who signs it, knows what he writes. Let us start at once.

Generals Morell, Butterfield, and Sykes still advised and urged that the march be delayed for two hours. They felt satisfied that General Pope would not have issued the order if he had known the tired condition of the troops, the darkness of the night, and the impassable condition of the road.

General Porter promptly sent a dispatch to General Pope telling him of these difficulties, suggesting a delay until 3 a. m., and requested him to send an officer of his staff to exercise authority in clearing the road of wagons sufficiently to enable the troops to march. General Pope did send officers to assist in clearing the road, which is conclusive evidence that he recognized and acknowledged the difficulty suggested by General Porter. That all these difficulties existed to the fullest extent claimed is proven beyond question.

Lieutenant-Colonel Myers testified (court record, page 110) that there were between two thousand and three thousand wagons, and Lieutenant Davis testified (board record, page 390):

Q. Do you recollect whether there were any obstructions in the way of marching from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station?
A. I recollect distinctly there were.
Q. What character?
A. Pope's wagon-train. The road was entirely blocked, and between two of those stations the wagon-train passed through our column and I individually went up to stop them. I asked them for the wagon-master, or if there was any officer in command of the train; the men said no; they had not seen the wagon-master for a week; they were traveling independent. I told them they must hold on or I would shoot them, and we did hold them after considerable trouble

It is equally evident General Porter could not have used the railroad.

It will be recalled that this very order said:

If Banks is not at the Junction, instruct Colonel Clary to run the trains back to this side of Cedar Run.

Colonel Clary testified (court record, page 120) that this order was given to him and Captain Fifield, and that trains were running until about 4 o'clock the next morning from Warrenton Junction to Kettle Run and back, which would effectually have prevented the use of the railway track for the troops, his reply to a direct question being, "The movement of the trains during the night would have prevented the possibility of moving troops upon the railroad track." But even if there had been no train, the open culverts would have made marching upon the railroad track almost impossible during a dark night. Porter overcame the difficulties and moved with more promptness and celerity than any other corps commander of Pope's army.

GENERAL POPE STATED ON OATH

that Porter was at Bristoe Station at 8 o'clock on the 28th. He also admits that Porter spoke to him of his march and the difficulty he had getting wagons out of the road, and the difficulty he had in getting through the wagon-trains, and with all that on his mind General Pope volunteers the distinct and explicit assertion that there had been no necessity for an earlier appearance of his corps.

In the face of these facts, my friend and colleague [Mr. STEELE] says:

He (Porter) was hoping at the time he received the order to be either ordered back to Falmouth or on to Washington. He wanted Pope defeated.

The gentleman does not deny but admits that Sykes, Morell, and Butterfield all said: "Oh! don't move at 1; wait till daylight."

Mr. STEELE. But, if my friend will allow me, they stated that they did not know the importance of the order, or they would not have said so.

Mr. WHEELER. And General Pope said the order had no importance. I have just stated that when Porter met Pope at 8 o'clock the next morning, Pope's first remark was that there had been no necessity for an earlier appearance of his corps.

And although the proof shows that Porter, by awaiting until 3 o'clock, was enabled to move his corps in good order to Bristoe Station, reaching that place at 8 o'clock, yet my friend does General Porter the injustice to say that he did this because he wanted Pope defeated.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. FULLER] says:

I am convinced that from the time General Fitz-John Porter on the 23d of August, 1862, was ordered to report to General Pope for duty, by direction of General Halleck, he was not in harmony with his commanding general; that he was guilty of conduct unbecoming an officer; that he was not a true soldier; that during the operations at Manassas he repeatedly refused and neglected to obey his commander-in-chief, and that to his course can be traced the direful results to the Union arms on that bloody field.

General Grant says:

On the contrary, to my mind now, he was zealous in giving a support to General Pope, and more so, possibly, for the reason that he knew among his former army associates there was a good deal of apprehension, to say the least, of his fitness for his new place.

Now remember that General Lee, with Longstreet's corps, was, at this time (August 27), approaching Thoroughfare Gap, and observe that McDowell, who was at Gainesville, could prevent his passing through to join Jackson, while with equal ease he could make it impossible for Jackson to join Longstreet.

The troops under Lee and Longstreet could not cross the mountain to attack General Pope, and those under General Jackson were necessarily most seriously imperiled. Not only were they liable to be attacked by the bulk of Pope's army, but the troops in front of Washington also threatened Jackson's forces.

It is seldom that a commander finds himself in so advantageous a position as was General Pope's army on the evening of August 27; but, notwithstanding this, he at once countermanded the orders which had resulted in this favorable disposition of his troops.

At 6.30 p. m. on the 27th, as we have seen, he orders Porter to start at 1 a. m. on the 28th for Bristoe Station. At 9 p. m. he orders McDowell, with his own and Sigel's corps and Reynolds's division to march at daylight, moving rapidly, to Manassas Junction, and simultaneously orders General Reno to move his corps to the same place, and directs General Kearny at the "first flush of the dawn," to push rapidly to Bristoe Station. None of these orders were strictly obeyed. General McDowell ordered Ricketts's division to remain and guard Thoroughfare Gap. This was an important matter, and had General Ricketts's force been adequate to the execution of the order it might have had a material effect upon the issue of the campaign.

Neither Generals Reno nor Kearny moved with the rapidity and promptness contemplated in the orders to them, and, as we have seen, General Porter encountered obstacles and difficulties which necessitated some delay, and yet it will be observed, he marched 10 miles and reached Bristoe Station at the same time that Kearny reached that place from his camp but 3 miles distant.

The orders to the generals stated these movements were to be executed for the purpose of "bagging" Jackson, but they only opened the way for Longstreet to join him; General Lee, with Longstreet's corps, having reached Thoroughfare Gap at 3 o'clock on the afternoon of August 28. The advanced regiment immediately attempted to pass the gap, but was repulsed. Two brigades were then pushed into the gap, while a division was sent 3 miles to the left to turn the enemy's right via Hopewell Gap. Other troops were dispatched over the mountain by a foot-path, and the Federals, being thus outflanked, retreated toward Gainesville. Early next morning the confederate columns were united and the advance was renewed to join Jackson, who was then engaged. Ten miles were quickly passed over, and the junction of General Lee's forces was completed by 9 o'clock a. m. on the 29th.

The position occupied by General Jackson was a strong one. After retiring during the night of the 27th from Manassas Junction, on the 28th he formed his line facing to the southeast. His right was near the Warrenton turnpike, a little to the east of Groveton, his left at Sudley Springs, on Bull Run, and the cuts, or excavations, prepared for a railroad were good substitutes for fortifications along some considerable portion of his front.

On the evening of the 28th, while en route from Gainesville to Centreville, King's division had a severe engagement with General Ewell, which only closed with night. Jackson was in the position above described near Groveton about 9 a. m. on the 29th, and commenced forming Longstreet's corps on the right of Jackson's line.

When Jackson selected this position he deceived General Pope by the stratagem of sending General A. P. Hill to Centreville, and during the afternoon and night of the 28th and on the morning of the 29th we find General Pope ordering McDowell, Reno, and Porter to that place. The order to the latter officer was conveyed in these words:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Near Bull Run, August 29, 1862—3 a. m.

GENERAL: McDowell has intercepted the retreat of Jackson. Sigel is immediately on the right of McDowell. Kearney and Hooker march to attack the enemy's rear at early dawn. Major-General Pope directs you to move upon Centreville at the first dawn of day with your whole command, leaving your trains to follow. It is very important that you should be here at a very early hour in the morning. A severe engagement is likely to take place, and your presence is necessary.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Major-General PORTER.

General Porter obeyed the order promptly, and marched at least 6 miles, to a point beyond Manassas Junction, when he was met by an order countermanding the above, which was in these terms:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, August 29, 1862.

To Maj. Gen. FITZ-JOHN PORTER:

Push forward with your corps and King's division, which you will take with you, upon Gainesville. I am following the enemy down the Warrenton turnpike. Be expeditious or we will lose much.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

General Porter countermarched and moved rapidly as directed. When within 4 miles of Gainesville he met Longstreet with 25,000 men deployed in line of battle. Porter was pressing forward to attack when, at 12 o'clock, General McDowell came upon the field, assumed the command and arrested Porter's advance. Porter here received what is called the "joint order," which I will read:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, August 29, 1862.

Generals McDOWELL and PORTER:

You will please move forward with your joint commands towards Gainesville. I sent General Porter written orders to that effect an hour and a half ago. Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno are moving on the Warrenton turnpike, and must now be not far from Gainesville. I desire that as soon as communication is established between this force and your own the whole command shall halt. It may be necessary to fall back behind Bull Run at Centreville to-night. I presume it will be so on account of our supplies. I have sent no orders of any description to Ricketts, and none to interfere in any way with the movements of McDowell's troops, except what I sent by aid-de-camp last night, which were to hold his position on the Warrenton pike until the troops from here should fall on the enemy's flank and rear. I do not even know Ricketts's position, as I have not been able to find out where General McDowell was until a late hour this morning. General McDowell will take immediate steps to communicate with General Ricketts and instruct him to join the other divisions of his corps as soon as practicable. If any considerable advantages are to be gained by departing from this order it will not be strictly carried out. One thing must be held in view: That the troops must occupy a position from which they can reach Bull Run to-night or by morning. The indications are that the whole force of the enemy is moving in this direction at a pace that will bring them here by to-morrow night or the next day. My own headquarters will, for the present, be with Heintzelman's corps or at this place.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

It will be observed that when this order reached General Porter's hands it had been fully complied with.

He did not receive the order until 12 o'clock, and all the proof shows he had anticipated and fully executed it. He had "moved forward with his command toward Gainesville" as far as he could go, and he had fully complied with the part of the order which said—

I desire that as soon as communication is established between this force—

and your own the whole command shall halt.

He had established communication with the force on his right, and he had formed line to engage Longstreet, whose forces were drawn up in his immediate front.

Even General McDowell testifies that Porter had complied with the directions of the order before it reached him, and all the facts show that General Porter gave an intelligent and prompt compliance with this and the two preceding orders which he received that day; and the proof also shows that General McDowell, who was senior to Porter, was present when Porter received the order; that he assumed command and became responsible for the movements of General Porter's corps.

General McDowell's exact language while testifying upon this point against Porter was (see record, page 83):

At that time I conceived General Porter to be under me. When the joint order reached us we were doing what that joint order directed us to do. That joint order found the troops in the position in which it directed them to be.

Mr. STEELE. Oh, no.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman says "Oh, no." I said, and I repeat, that General McDowell says, "At that time I conceived Porter to be under my command. When the joint order reached us we were doing what the joint order directed us to do. That joint order found the troops in the position which it directed them to occupy." That is McDowell's testimony.

Mr. STEELE. I do not like to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish to be interrupted. I desire to answer any questions. I wish to make the matter plain.

Mr. STEELE. The joint order itself says: "I directed you to move toward Gainesville over an hour ago." Now, before Porter received that joint order he had halted in front of Dawkin's Branch. The joint order did not tell him to halt; it told him to go on. He had been ordered to go on more than an hour before, but instead of that he halted. The question was put to him before the McDowell board: "If you had not received the joint order, what would have been the consequence?" And his answer was, "I suppose I would have gone on and would have interfered with the joining of the forces, or would have been whipped."

Mr. WHEELER. I am confident the gentleman is mistaken. The joint order says:

> You will please move orward with your joint commands toward Gainesville. I sent General Porter written orders to that effect an hour and a half ago. Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno are moving on the Warrenton turnpike, and must now be not far from Gainesville. I desire that as soon as communication is established between this force and your own the whole command shall halt. It may be necessary to fall back behind Bull Run at Centreville to-night. I presume it will be so on account of our supplies.

Mr. STEELE. Yes; but he did not join the forces. He would have joined the forces if he had gone on as directed.

Mr. WHEELER. Let us see. Here are maps sworn to be correct. Here [indicating] is Reynolds; here [indicating] is Porter. Now if he had gone on he would not have done what he was ordered to do. He would not have established communication with the other forces—Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno—because the other force had not gone to where General Pope said it had gone. Porter went nearer to Gainesville than Pope's other troops did.

Mr. STEELE. I never before heard of a few disconnected lines on a piece of paper being called a map. Those lines don't indicate anything. They are hung "out in the air." I don't know what positions you intend to show by those lines. There is no road indicated.

Mr. WHEELER. I tell you this is copied from the maps of the Engineer officers. This [indicating] is Pope's force, exclusive of Porter's; this [indicating] represents McDowell; this [indicating] represents Longstreet. This is not my map, but it is copied from the map of the Engineers, and I invite anybody to examine and see if it is not a correct copy of the map made by the Government officers, and which is admitted by all parties to be correct.

Mr. STEELE. Well, I say that I know something about maps, but I can not make head or tail of that one.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not suppose you can, because it seems to me you have not been able to make either head or tail of this case. I think the trouble with the gentlemen opposed to the bill is that they do not want to understand it. If they saw the facts as they are, their consciences would not let them vote against the bill. From the arguments and theories advanced by the opponents of the bill, they appear determined to ignore the evidence in the case which convinced the Schofield board and General Grant that they had been in error as to most of the essential facts of the case, and have limited their investigations and studies to the misstatements of the witnesses before the court-martial, the disingenuous argument of Judge Holt which imposed upon Mr. Lincoln, and Pope's interested version of the points at issue which misled Grant.

The red lines indicate the confederates and the dark blue represent the Federal army.

Mr. STEELE. I shall not undertake to make the gentleman understand it, but the House I think understood my map the other day. It was an official map, made not only by an officer of the Government but by a friend of Porter.

Mr. WHEELER. I will take great pains and pleasure in explaining everything to my friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE]. One of the large maps is a copy of "Board map No. 2," showing the general situation of Pope's and Lee's armies at 4.30 p. m. August 29, 1862. The other large map is a copy of "Board map No. 3," which shows the supposed military situation under which the 4.30 p. m. order was issued. I have had these two maps very much enlarged so they can be seen and understood at a distance, but, as I said before, as proof of their accuracy I place below them the small original maps from which they are copied. I shall put these small fac-similes in the RECORD.

Skirmishing had become quite brisk along Porter's deployed line, which Porter was endeavoring to press close on the enemy. It has been proven by five witnesses that General McDowell, seeing this, said:

> Porter, you are too far out already; this is no place to fight a battle.

McDowell then turned to the rear and marched his corps from the field, to form it some 2 miles to Porter's right. About sundown, while making this movement, a portion of one of his divisions, under General Hatch, encountered two brigades under General Hood, and an engagement followed which lasted about an hour. The only severe fighting that day was some 3 miles to the right near Groveton, where Generals Sigel, Hooker, Kearny, Reynolds, and Reno were engaged with Stonewall Jackson.

The statement of some zealous opponents to this bill, that as General McDowell left Dawkin's Branch he ordered Porter to attack Longstreet, is a serious disparagement, not to say insult, to General McDowell. It is a charge that General McDowell marched his eighteen thousand men from the field and at the same time ordered Porter with nine thousand to attack the twenty-five thousand men under Longstreet. This illustrates the inconsistencies in which people become involved when they attempt to assume positions which are unreasonable and without foundation.

Our friends of the minority have exhibited remarkable industry. They appear to have done all that human exertion could accomplish to show that when Porter received the joint order a great battle was being waged between Pope's forces and those of Jackson and Longstreet, and that Porter should have attacked anything he found in his front. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] says Porter had three orders to do so. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] evidently saw Mr. STEELE's error, and he interjects the opinion that Porter should have attacked "with or without" orders.

The first order Porter received that day said:

> Major-General Pope directs that you move upon Centreville.

The second order countermanded this, and said:

> Push forward upon Gainesville.

The third order reiterated the second, and said:

> I desire that as soon as communication is established between this force—
> Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno—
> and your own the whole command shall halt.

McDowell did

NOT ORDER PORTER TO ATTACK, and I assert that until after 6 o'clock that evening he had no orders from any one to attack.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] also makes an effort to prove that the forces under Pope's immediate command were engaging Longstreet as well as Jackson when the joint order was received.

To establish these two propositions he read the official reports of many generals, but unfortunately for him these reports, so far from sustaining his position, tend to prove the contrary.

It is true that Sigel speaks of being engaged in the morning of the 29th, but he says:

> During two hours, from 4 to 6 p. m., strong cannonading and musketry continued on our center and right, where General Kearny made a successful effort against the extreme left of the enemy's lines.
> At 6.15 o'clock Brigadier-General King's division of Major-General McDowell's corps arrived behind our front and advanced on the Gainesville turnpike.

General Hatch's first allusion to any engagement was in these words:

> Late on the afternoon of the 29th ultimo I was ordered by General McDowell in person (who was at the time stationed near the stone house, on the turnpike from Gainesville to Centreville) to move the division on the Gainesville road in pursuit of the enemy, who he informed me were retreating.

General Heintzelman says:

> At 11 a. m. the head of Hooker's division arrived; General Reno an hour later. At the request of General Sigel I ordered General Hooker to place one of his brigades at General Sigel's disposal to re-enforce a portion of his line then hard pressed. General Grover reported, and before long became engaged, and was afterward supported by the whole division. General Pope arrived between 1 and 2 p. m. The enemy were driven back a short distance toward Sudley church, where they made another stand, and again pressed a portion of our line back. All this time General Kearny's division held its position on our extreme right. Several orders were sent him to advance, but he did not move until after the troops on his left had been forced back, which was near 6 p. m.

The report of General Grover shows that his severest fighting was after 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

The only troops of Longstreet that engaged any one beside Porter on that day were the two brigades under Hood. This officer says in his report (War Records, volume 12, part 2, page 605) that the order for him to make the attack reached him at sunset.

General John F. Reynolds, a witness before the court which condemned Porter, testified in these words (Schofield board, page 165):

> Q. On the 29th, before 4 o'clock p. m., what was the character of the battle—artillery or infantry?
> A. Principally artillery.
> Q. About what time did the infantry fire commence in force and volume?
> A. As near as I can recollect it must have been between 4 and 5 o'clock, probably 5 o'clock; that is, I refer to the part near me. There may have been infantry firing on the right which I could not hear.

The Schofield board, after an exhaustive examination of this matter, in speaking of the battle of the 29th, say:

> That battle consisted of a number of sharp and gallant combats between small portions of the opposing forces. These combats were of short duration and were separated by long intervals of simple skirmishing and artillery duels. Until after 6 o'clock only a small part of the troops on either side were engaged at any time during the afternoon. Then, about sunset, one additional division on each side was engaged near Groveton.

General Grant says:

> Until 1881, when I re-examined for myself, my belief was that on the 29th of August, 1862, a great battle was fought. * * * Now, on a full investigation of facts, I find that the battle was fought on the 30th of August; that your (Porter's) corps, commanded directly by you (Porter) in person, lost a greater percentage than any other corps engaged.

But there is one witness to the fact that no severe fighting occurred prior to 4.30 p. m. on the 29th, whose accuracy I suppose will be admitted by my friend [Mr. STEELE], and that is General Pope himself. No general would communicate orders to his corps commanders during a great battle without mentioning it, and we see that General Pope was very particular and prompt to mention, if not to magnify, every conflict. Pope's order to Porter, written during the morning, which directed him to push forward on Gainesville; the joint order, written just before noon, and the 4.30 p. m. order, all fail to speak of any engagement.

The joint order states what his army is doing, and says it is occupied in marching, not fighting. He says he is with Heintzelman's corps, which, together with Sigel and Reno, is moving down the Warrenton pike. He orders that when Porter shall have established communication with this force he shall halt.

He says—now listen:

Ricketts's orders are to hold his position until the troops from here fall on the enemy's flank and rear.

This is positive proof that up to that time they had not done so.

The order states, and reiterates, that the troops must occupy a position from which they can fall back behind Bull Run at Centreville.

Even the 4.30 order does not mention any fight, but says the enemy is massed in the woods in front of us, but can be shelled out as soon as you engage their flank. This is proof that he was only contemplating an attack up to that time.

The gentlemen who oppose this bill reiterate the statement made by Pope in his dispatch of 5 a. m. August 30, which reads:

We fought a terrific battle here yesterday with the combined forces of the enemy. * * * We have lost not less than eight thousand men, killed and wounded.

The official reports show this to be absolutely untrue—at least four times as big as the truth.

No one contends that any troops besides Porter's were engaged on that day except Reynolds, Sigel, Hooker, Kearny, Reno, and King, and General Pope's official report does not mention any other troops as being engaged, and that report says that King attacked about sunset.

The official reports (War Records, volume 12, part 2, pages 250 to 262) show that the entire losses, in killed and wounded, of these troops from August 16 to September 2, including the battle of Chantilly, the terrible battle of the Second Manassas, August 30, the battle of the 29th, the battle at Groveton on the 28th, the fight at Kettle Run on the 27th, and all other battles, skirmishes, affairs, and combats of every character were as follows:

Sigel's corps	1,656
Reynolds's division	465
Kearny's division (Heintzelman's corps)	851
Hooker's division (Heintzelman's corps)	934
Reno (Ninth Corps)	1,204
Doubleday's brigade (King's division)	210
Total	5,320

I only put in Doubleday's brigade of King's division because Pope says King attacked at sunset of the 29th, and all the reports show that Doubleday's brigade did this fighting.

It is therefore shown by the records that instead of these troops losing eight thousand men on the 29th, their killed and wounded during the entire campaign were but five thousand three hundred and twenty—less than two-thirds of eight thousand.

And while there were no separate reports of the losses on the 29th, it must be evident to any one who reads all the reports that the losses on that day could not have exceeded fifteen hundred to two thousand men.

The report prepared by General Kearny (War Records, volume 12, part 2, page 416) shows that most of the fighting on the 29th was done by four regiments—exactly half of one of his brigades—and yet I have included in the five thousand three hundred and twenty the aggregate of the losses of all his division during the entire campaign.

The argument of my friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], as well as that of others opposed to this bill, seemed to be based upon his sustaining the position that a great battle was going on from noon until night on the 29th, and therefore I have made these citations to show the glaring error into which they have been betrayed.

My colleague [Mr. STEELE] also quotes from General Longstreet's official report, and prefaces it by saying:

And I want my friend and colleague on the committee, General WHEELER, to hear what Longstreet says.

I beg my friend to accept my thanks for the quotation, and also for thus emphasizing it upon the attention of the House. From this quotation I now read:

General D. R. Jones's division was placed upon the Manassas Gap Railroad.

This was in front of Porter.

From the same quotation I read further:

Major-General Stuart reported the approach of the enemy in heavy columns against my extreme right. I withdrew General Wilcox, with his three brigades, from the left, and placed his command in position to support Jones in case of an attack against my right.

My friend's own witness

THUS ESTABLISHES THE FACT that a large proportion of Longstreet's force was withdrawn from in front of Reynolds, Sigel, and Hooker to oppose Porter, who, according to my friend's theory and belief, remained perfectly quiet and made no demonstration whatever against Longstreet's force.

While this fight at Groveton was in progress General Pope dictated the following:

HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD, August 29, 1862—4.30 p. m.

Major-General PORTER:

Your line of march brings you in on the enemy's right flank. I desire you to push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and, if possible, on his rear, keeping your right in communication with General Reynolds. The enemy is massed in the woods in front of us, but can be shelled out as soon as you engage their flank. Keep heavy reserves, and use your batteries, keeping well closed to your right all the time. In case you are obliged to fall back, do so to your right and rear, so as to keep you in close communication with the right wing.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

This will be recognized as the famous "4.30 order," the alleged noncompliance with which has for twenty-four years been relied upon by the supporters of General Pope as the grand central fact which supported and vivified all the reckless charges against the honor and patriotism of General Porter, and to which they now appeal to

to that gallant soldier which is contemplated by this bill. As this alleged failure to comply with this order constitutes the very core, the soul, the life, of all the charges against General Porter, it is evident that his complete vindication must follow the establishment of the fact that such compliance was simply impossible, and that it was issued by General Pope in ignorance of the actual situation in which his army was placed.

It is worse than useless for Porter's enemies to attempt now to change their position and fall back upon the argument that Pope was aware of Longstreet's presence, and that this order contemplated an attack upon Longstreet. Only four hours before, General Pope's dispatch to Generals McDowell and Porter had asserted that it would require a march of from thirty-six to forty-eight hours for Longstreet to form a junction with Jackson. General Pope's exact words were:

The indications are that the whole force of the enemy is moving in this direction at a pace that will bring them here by to-morrow night or next day.

If further evidence be required to show that the order referred only to an attack on Jackson's right it is supplied by the order itself, which positively asserts "the enemy is massed in the woods in front of us," and as he had placed Longstreet thirty-six to forty-eight hours distant, even he could not have expected General Porter to make an immediate attack on a force so far off.

As confirmatory of this position, General Pope, on December 4, testified at Porter's trial in these words:

Had General Porter fallen upon the flank of the enemy, as it was hoped, at any time up to 8 o'clock that night, it is my firm conviction that we should have destroyed the army of Jackson.

Here he specifies Jackson in explicit terms, and says nothing about Longstreet.

Again, on December 6, General Pope testified:

General Porter was expected to attack if possible—and as I understood it to be practicable—the right flank of Jackson's forces, and if possible the rear of his forces, to prevent, if it were practicable, the junction of Longstreet's forces with Jackson's, and to crush Jackson's flank before Longstreet could effect a junction with him. I did not then believe, nor do I now believe, that at that time (4.30 p. m.) any considerable portion of Longstreet's corps had reached the vicinity of the field. I do not know that General Porter between 5.30 p. m. and 7 o'clock had the enemy immediately in his front, though I would think it altogether likely that Jackson would have pushed out some force to observe the road between Gainesville and Manassas Junction. It is altogether likely, therefore, that some of Jackson's troops were in the presence of General Porter's advance, though of my own knowledge I do not know that.

This eager testimony of the prosecutor on the trial must settle this point in Porter's favor.

Having shown that Pope could have

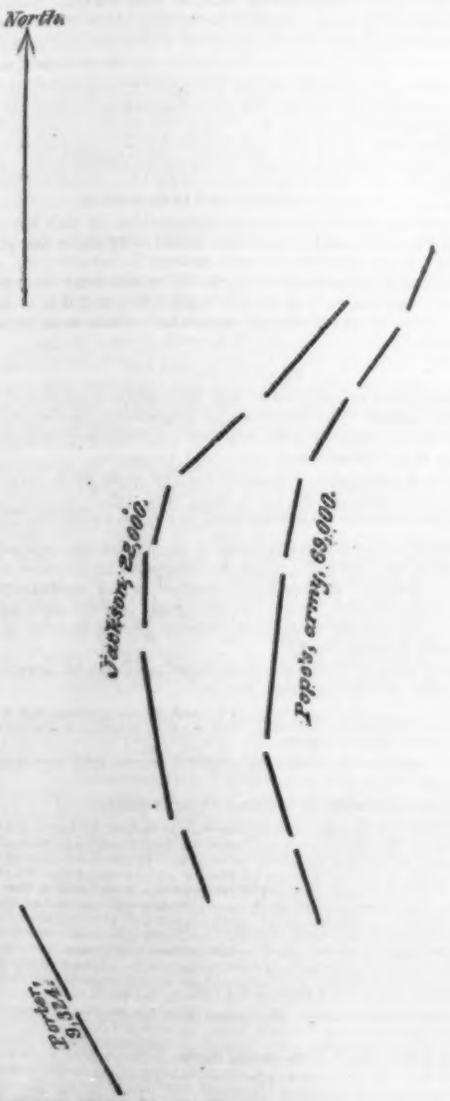
as the enemy to be assailed, the next point in the defense is that, no matter who he was ordered to attack, Porter did not receive the order until nearly one hour later than the time fixed for its reception by Pope's witnesses at the trial. This is now so clearly established and is so universally admitted, that no one with any regard for his reputation dare attempt to controvert this vital fact.



As another and distinct defense of General Porter I beg to call attention to the following utterances of that illustrious and successful soldier the late General and ex-President Grant:

But, even if the position of Lee's army had been thirty-six to forty-eight hours distant, as asserted in the joint order to McDowell and Porter, it would have been impossible for Porter to have obeyed the 4.30 order, because it did not contemplate a night attack, and was not received by Porter until about dark. To have obeyed it would have required some little preparation, movement of troops, and distribution of orders, so that it would have been some time after dark before he could have moved from the position he was then occupying, and at least as late as 9 o'clock at night before he could have reached Jackson's flank to engage it. His efforts to execute the order, notwithstanding its apparent inappropriateness, demonstrate this assertion.

Now I will ask attention to the map. All the evidence of Pope and of the witnesses he summoned stated that when that (the 4.30) order was issued Pope was in this position [indicating on the map], Fitz-John Porter was in this position [indicating], Stonewall Jackson in this position [indicating], and Longstreet thirty-six hours away; and therefore it was very proper for Porter to attack Jackson's flank and rear. This is an exact copy of the map which was made by the Government to show the supposed position at 4.30 p. m., simply made on a larger scale; and no man now denies but this was the supposed situation of Pope's army, and the record shows that Pope testified before the Porter court in 1862 that such was his situation.

Diagram showing the position Pope supposed the contending forces to occupy when he issued the 4.30 p. m. order.

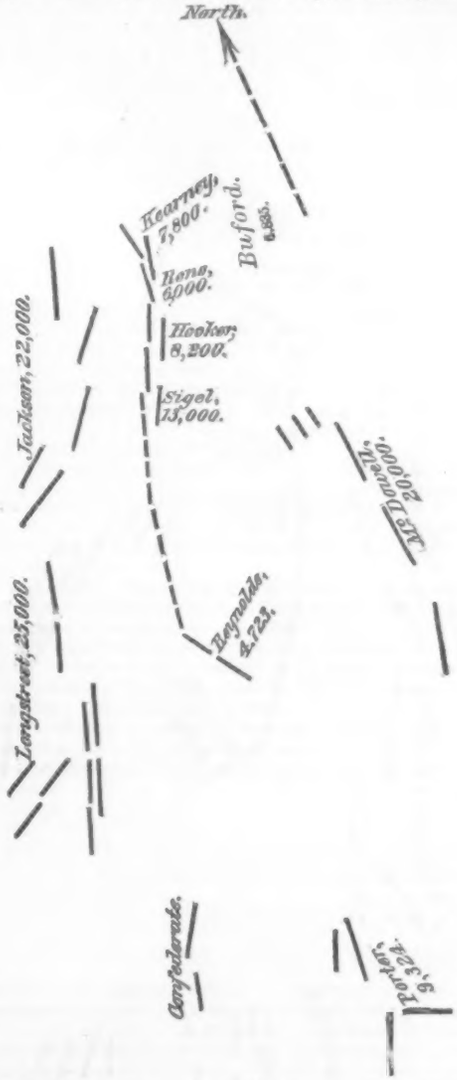
Mr. STEELE. Now, do I understand the red line represents Jackson?

Mr. WHEELER. It represents Jackson.

Mr. STEELE. And facing south?

Mr. WHEELER. Southeast.

Mr. STEELE. Your map shows him facing south. If that is not facing south I do not understand the map.



Mr. WHEELER. I do not expect the gentleman to understand it unless he desires to do so.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama, General OATES, if he understands that. He was there.

Mr. OATES. I understand very well what the situation was.

Mr. WHEELER. I am willing to yield to any proper interruptions, but I do not wish my time to be consumed by gentlemen who do not wish to understand things put before them in a clear and natural way. My friend General OATES understands the maps, and I think my friend Mr. STEELE understands them also; but I will gladly yield to either for any question.

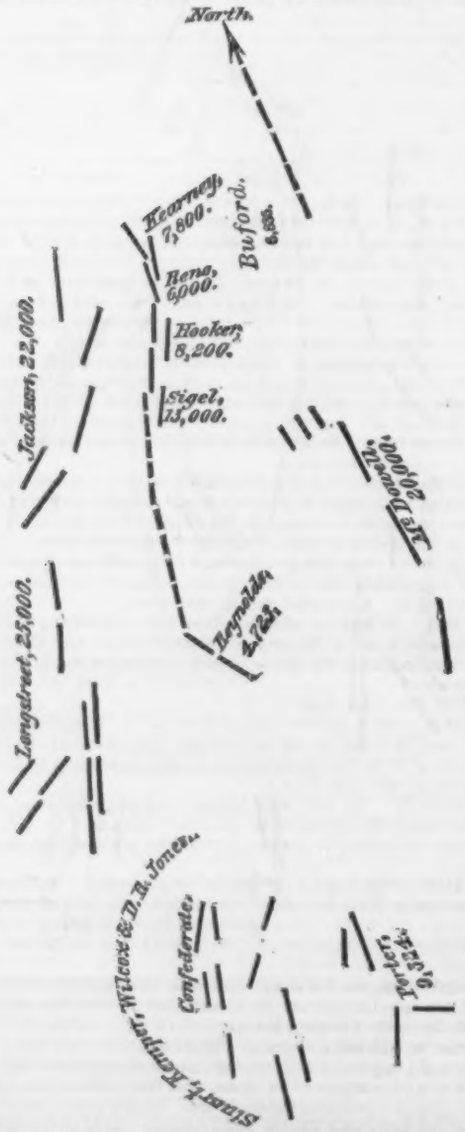
Diagram showing the position of the two armies at the time the 4.30 p. m. order was issued, as claimed by Government counsel before the Schofield board.

Here [indicating on the map] was Pope's army; Reynolds here; Reno there. Here was Longstreet; here was Porter; here was McDowell going to join the rest of Pope's army.

The order would have required Porter to march his corps along the entire front of Longstreet's line of battle and attack Stonewall Jackson's flank, a thing impossible to be done, and therefore Grant says a thing he ought not to have attempted to do. Grant says that fortunately this order did not reach Porter until sunset. If it had reached him, a man of his determination to obey orders, he would have obeyed it, and Grant and Longstreet both say if he had attempted to obey it it would have caused disaster to his army. It would have been nine thousand men fighting and attacking twenty-five thousand.

Mr. STEELE. Did not Longstreet have something else to do there? Will the gentleman explain if he was there with thirty-five thousand men, and knew Porter was in his front with nine thousand, why did he not wipe out Porter?

Mr. WHEELER. Because he did not know that Porter had so small a force. He saw Porter move on him with so much energy. [Laughter.] I quote from what the gentleman read on Thursday——



Mr. STEELE. I deny that I said he had displayed any energy.

Mr. WHEELER. I have already correctly quoted what my friend said last Thursday, but I will repeat it. I read from his speech in the RECORD:

> And I want my friend and colleague on the committee, General WHEELER, to hear what Longstreet says:
> * * * * * * * *
> "Three brigades, under General Wilcox, were thrown forward to the support of the left, and three others, under General Kemper, to the support of the right of these commands.
> "General D. R. Jones's division was placed upon the Manassas Gap Railroad to the right and en échelon with regard to the last three brigades. Colonel Walton placed his batteries in a commanding position between my line and that of General Jackson, and engaged the enemy for several hours in a severe and successful artillery duel. At a late hour in the day Major-General Stuart reported the approach of the enemy in heavy columns against my extreme right. I withdrew General Wilcox, with his three brigades, from the left and placed his command in position to support Jones in case of an attack against my right."

Diagram showing the actual position of the two armies on the afternoon of August 29, as shown by the evidence before the Schofield board and official reports, when the confederate divisions of Wilcox, Kemper, and D. R. Jones, and Stuart's cavalry were in Porter's front.

This shows that Porter occupied the attention of and prevented three divisions, Wilcox's, Kemper's, and D. R. Jones's, and Stuart's cavalry, a force nearly double his own, from engaging other troops of General Pope's army.

But if we grant, in defiance of the well-established facts in the case, that the order did reach Porter at the hour specified at the trial, it is manifest to every one at all familiar with history that General Porter would have been fully justified had he flatly refused to even attempt its execution.

As I have already shown, in anticipating the "joint order" to himself and McDowell, General Porter had, as early as 12 o'clock, deployed his line to engage a superior force of the enemy in his immediate front, which force obstructed his "line of march" as laid down in the "joint order," and which is referred to in the 4.30 order.

Any commanding officer must have realized at once that the order just delivered to him had been issued under a total misapprehension of the actual state of affairs upon the Federal left. General Pope says distinctly that Porter's line of march would bring him "on the enemys' right flank."

BUT PORTER KNEW

that he was already opposed to a superior force immediately in his front. The order, and Pope's evidence at the trial, already quoted, shows it to have been issued in the belief that Jackson had received no re-enforcements whatever. Porter knew that Lee's whole army was united, and that while the commanding general, at 4.30 p. m., fancied himself to be opposed only by an isolated fraction of the confederate forces, he was, in fact, at the date of the order, and had been since 12 o'clock, opposed by Lee's entire army most advantageously posted in a formidable position. The order directed Porter to "fall back to his right and rear" in case a retrograde movement became necessary. Porter knew that to attempt an attack on the enemy's right flank could have no other result than to cut him off from the possibility of retiring by his right and rear, as it would inevitably interpose a greatly superior force of the enemy between himself and the line of retreat he was directed to pursue.

It is barely possible that some persons may be found who, declining to argue the question on its merits, will venture to assert that notwithstanding Porter's knowledge of facts, of which it was evident his commander must be ignorant, he had no right to allow his knowledge to influence his action; that having received a definite and explicit order to attack the enemy's right flank, he had no option as a good soldier and zealous officer, but that it was his plain and imperative duty to find the enemy's right flank and make the attack, leaving his superiors to assume all the responsibility for any adverse result of this blind obedience.

A sufficient answer to this is to be found in the fact that in every army that was ever organized, from the time of Alexander to the present day, the commander of a subdivision so important as a corps, not immediately under the eye of his general, exposed to various contingencies, and receiving from his chief only general instructions or such instructions as were palpably prompted by misapprehension or ignorance of his situation, must have some discretionary power.

The duty of a corps commander is the same as the duty of an army commander, and the duty of each is to his country and to his men. And as his men constitute the instrument which alone enables him to discharge his duty to his country, it is obvious that he has the responsibility of exercising his discretion when forced to choose whether he will sacrifice success and jeopardize his country or fail to comply literally with an order evidently issued in ignorance or misapprehension of his situation.

And this, I maintain, was precisely the case with General Porter. The order was based, as we have seen, upon the false assumption that Jackson could receive no accession of strength under thirty-six hours; that his (Jackson's) right flank was "in the air," and that by following the line of march indicated in a previous order Porter would be able to attack him at this superlative disadvantage.

Now Porter knew, from actual contact with the foe, that every presumption of his commander was erroneous, and he was fully justified in using the discretion inseparable from his position to preserve his command as the only means of averting the irreparable catastrophe which he saw was probably impending as the result of his commanding general's erroneous impressions.

General Longstreet, who has been in full sympathy with the Republican party for twenty years, has recently published an article in the Century Magazine, in which he discusses the possibility of Porter's obedience to this order, and which I will now read:

General Pope, sanguine by nature, was not careful enough to keep himself informed about the movements of his enemy. At half past four on the afternoon of the 29th he issued an order for Porter to attack Jackson's right, supposing I was at Thoroughfare Gap, when in fact I had been in position since noon, and was anxiously awaiting an attack. It has been said that General Stuart, by raising a dust in front of Porter, so impressed him that he did not offer battle. I know nothing of the truth of the story, and never heard of it till after the war. If from any such cause Porter was prevented from attacking me it was to our disadvantage, and delayed our victory twenty-four hours. Porter knew I was in his front. He had captured one or two of my men, which gave him information of my position before he actually saw me. If Porter had not appeared when he did I would have attacked by our right early in the afternoon. In that event Porter would have had a fine opportunity to take me on the wing and strike a fearful blow. As it was, he was a check upon my move against Pope's main position. If I had advanced upon Pope I would have been under an enfilade fire from Porter's batteries, and if I had advanced upon Porter I would have been under a fire from the batteries on Pope's front as severe as the raking fire from my batteries the next day, when Pope was massed against Jackson. Had Porter attacked me between noon and night on the 29th, I should have received his nine thousand with about double that number. I would have held my line to receive the attack, and as soon as his line developed its strength, I would have thrown three brigades forward beyond his extreme left. When my line of battle had broken up the attack, as it certainly would have done, these three brigades would have been thrown forward at the flank, and at the same time my main line would have pushed on in the pursuit.

The result would have been Porter's retreat in confusion, and I might possibly have reached Pope's left and rear in time to cut him off. When his army was well concentrated on the 30th he was badly cut up and defeated. It does not seem unreasonable to conclude that attack on 29th in his disjointed condition would have been attended with more disastrous results to him. If I had been attacked under the 4.30 order the result might have been less damaging, as Porter would have had the night to cover his retreat, and the Federal Army could have availed itself of the darkness to screen its move back across Bull Run. But Porter's attack at night, if not followed by the retreat of the Army, would have drawn me around the Federal left, and put me in a position for striking the next day.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. FULLER] says:

There is no evidence that there was a large force of the enemy in front of General Porter.

But General Grant says:

From 11 o'clock of the 29th he (Porter) was confronted by a force of twice his own number, of whose presence he had positive proof, while General Pope did not know of it.

When I last had the honor to address the House on this question I pointed out the deplorable results of a literal but unintelligent compliance with orders, as exemplified in the case of Marshal Grouchy. That too-obedient commander blindly followed, as he claimed, his understanding of the meaning conveyed by the order he received, and this undiscriminating regard for the precise terms of the order as he interpreted it defeated the most brilliant campaign ever planned and brought irretrievable disaster upon the greatest commander of the world.

It was literal and unintelligent compliance with orders which caused the disaster at Balaklava. When the order was given its execution was possible and might have been fruitful of good results; when its execution was attempted the conditions had changed, and the attempt to carry out an order which contemplated entirely different circumstances from those actually existing was criminal.

This view of the duty and discretionary power of a corps commander is fully sustained by Napoleon's seventy-second maxim of war, which I will read:

A general-in-chief has no right to shelter his mistakes in war under cover of his sovereign or of a minister when these are both distant from the scene of operation, and must consequently be either ill-informed or wholly ignorant of the actual state of things.

Hence it follows that every general is culpable who undertakes the execution of a plan which he considers faulty. It is his duty to represent his reasons, to insist upon a change of plan; in short, to give in his resignation rather than allow himself to be made the instrument of his army's ruin. Every general-in-chief who fights a battle in consequence of superior orders with the certainty of losing it is equally blamable.

In this last-mentioned case the general ought to refuse obedience, because a blind obedience is due only to a military command given by a superior present on the spot at the moment of action. Being in possession of the real state of things, the superior has it then in his power to afford the necessary explanations to the person who executes his orders. But supposing a general-in-chief to receive a positive order from his sovereign, directing him to fight a battle, with the further injunction to yield to his adversary and allow himself to be defeated, ought he to obey it? No. If the general should be able to comprehend the meaning or utility of such an order he should execute it, otherwise he should refuse to obey it.

This maxim is peculiarly applicable to the situation of General Porter when he received each of the three orders he was charged with disobeying. He was the commander of an army corps, who, it was evident, was "ill-informed or wholly ignorant of the actual state of things," and under the maxim would, therefore, have been fully justified in exercising his discretion.

SEPARATED FROM HIS CHIEF,

We see running through all of Napoleon's campaigns instances in which the most trusted and capable of his lieutenants did not comply strictly with his orders; and his dispatches show that he was frequently vexed and irritated, but in nearly every case after understanding the facts he fully justified their judicious exercise of discretion.

I believe allusion has been made to M. Thiers's censure of Ney for failing to comply with one of Napoleon's orders at Quatre Bras. An eminent writer, in replying to this a quarter of a century ago, said:

To this we reply that a commander intrusted with such a large command, and exposed to contingencies so various and receiving none but general instructions from his chief, must be considered to possess some discretionary power. Now, Napoleon's orders to Ney were given, as we have seen, under the false impression that Sombref and Quatre Bras would be occupied with little or no opposition, and that Brussels would be open to the French and attainable in a single march. If ever, then, a chief in Ney's position is perfectly justified in using discretionary power, it is when his instructions prove to have been given from a false estimate of the facts. We say, then, that he was right to use his discretion, and we say, also, that he used his discretion rightly with caution in advancing.

Mr. BRUMM. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to ask him this question: In every instance of an order disobeyed by an inferior commander under Napoleon where Napoleon justified the disobedience, was it not a case where the commander was out of Napoleon's reach and the emergency was such a one as to require immediate action?

Mr. WHEELER. In about a hundred cases that I have read of the subordinate commander was nearer to Napoleon than Porter was to Pope in this case.

Mr. BRUMM. That is only part of an answer to my question. The commander may have been nearer to Napoleon, but was not the emergency so extreme that it required immediate action?

Mr. WHEELER. It was not an emergency requiring more immediate action than was required in the case we have been considering here.

Mr. BRUMM. I should like the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] to name such a case.

Mr. WHEELER. I will name this one that I am speaking of now, where Marshal Ney, 5 miles distant from Napoleon, disobeyed his order at Quatre Bras, and Napoleon justified him in doing so. But we do not need to go to France for testimony on this point. We need not go to any other witness than General Pope himself.

I have not the time to read many cases, but I will cite one which comes to my mind, and which my friend will admit applies here with great force.

This principle, or I might say law, governing military operations, sanctioned by immemorial usage, was recognized by General Pope time and again during his brief career as commander of the Army of Virginia, and in no instance do we find that he censured this exercise of discretionary power.

Not only that, but we find that, when a witness before the McDowell court of inquiry, when all the facts must have been fresh in his mind, and when the ink, which recorded his testimony against Fitz-John Porter was hardly dry, he expressly sanctioned and asserted the principle that a corps commander situated as Porter was was vested with this discretionary power and should exercise it.

On January 14, 1863, at the instance of a member of the McDowell court, the recorder read the order from Major-General Pope to Major-General McDowell, dated Headquarter's Army of Virginia, Bristoe Station, August 27, 1862, 9 o'clock p. m., in which we find these words:

At daylight to-morrow morning march rapidly on Manassas Junction with your whole force, resting your right on the Manassas Gap Railroad, throwing your left well to the east. * * * If you will march promptly and rapidly at the earliest dawn of day upon Manassas Junction we shall bag the whole crowd. * * * Be expeditious and the day is our own.

If ever there was an order which, from its language and the promise of great results to follow its execution, called for implicit obedience, it was this. It was not only an to do a certain thing "with his whole force," accompanied by explicit instructions to do it in a certain way, but it expressed the commander's assured conviction that prompt and exact compliance would surely be followed by the most glorious results. General McDowell was assured by General Pope that if he obeyed this order promptly and expeditiously victory was certain. And more than that; this victory must be followed by the capture of the whole force of the enemy, and that capture must have ended the campaign and closed the war.

And yet, notwithstanding all these incentives and allurements, General McDowell not merely failed to obey this imperative order, but actually disobeyed it. He did not march his corps in the manner directed, and instead of "marching rapidly on Manassas Junction with your [his] whole force" he sent a large division under General Ricketts in an exactly opposite direction.

Nor is this the worst. He did not march with his corps, but left it entirely, separating himself 6 miles from one division and 10 miles from the other, and while thus separated from them both divisions became engaged with the enemy in the absence of their commander.

Mr. BRUMM. I hope the gentleman will permit me to ask, because I think this is probably the turning point in this whole case——

Mr. WHEELER. I am glad you say so.

Mr. BRUMM. Where an inferior officer acts contrary to his instructions does he not assume the entire responsibility, and does he not make himself responsible for the approval or disapproval of his immediate commander?

Mr. WHEELER. He does.

Mr. BRUMM. Now, in this case, did not Fitz-John Porter disobey a command, and in doing so did he not take upon himself the responsibility of meeting with the approbation or disapprobation of his immediate commander, who was Pope?

Mr. WHEELER. He did; and he met his approbation. General Pope said he was perfectly satisfied with the conduct of Porter; but afterward, when he wanted to destroy Porter, he preferred these charges against him.

Mr. BRUMM. Then the question is simply—and I will not interrupt the gentleman further—the question is simply one of veracity as to whether Pope did at any time approve of Porter's action or did not.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes, sir; and I will prove that he did so before I get through.

Very naturally the court was astounded at this flagrant disobedience of orders by a corps commander in the face of the enemy; and in the discharge of its duty propounded the following question to General Pope, then on the witness-stand and under oath:

Q. After the order just read to you had General McDowell any discretionary power to send Ricketts's division to Thoroughfare Gap to check the approach of Longstreet?

A. At the time that the order in question was written I was satisfied that we had completely interposed between the forces under Jackson and the main body of the enemy yet to the westward of the Bull Run range. The order directing General McDowell's march would have carried him to the eastward and in the same direction in which the main body of the enemy was marching to join Jackson. I believed then, and believe now, that we were sufficiently in advance of Longstreet, who was supposed to lead the main body of the enemy, that by using our whole force vigorously we should be able to crush Jackson completely before Longstreet by any possibility could have reached the scene of action. I sent nothing to General McDowell concerning Thoroughfare Gap, and regretted afterward that any portion of his forces had been detached in that direction. General McDowell had the discretion, however, necessarily incident to his position and to his distance from me to make such a disposition to cover his rear as he might consider necessary. (War Records, volume 12, part 1, page 205.)

This testimony of General Pope must have made a marked impression on the court, for in stating the facts developed by the inquiry, and the opinions reached, the court uses this very emphatic and significant language:

The court also felt bound to report the fact that his commanding officer, General Pope, not only omitted to hold him culpable for this separation, but emphatically commended his whole conduct while under his command, without exception or qualification. (War Records, volume 12, part 1, page 331.)

I should like to know by what peculiar mental process any one can reach the conclusion that General McDowell is to be justified and commended for exercising the "discretion necessarily incident to his position and to his distance from me" (General Pope), and General Porter is to be censured, condemned, and punished for doing the very same thing?

If further evidence be wanted of General Pope's acceptance of this principle of the right and duty of a commander not under the immediate eye of his chief, nor in immediate communication with him, to exercise his discretion, we also find that this very McDowell court of inquiry alluded to the fact that both Generals Ricketts and King disobeyed the orders of General McDowell, and not only did they escape all censure, but were made members of the court which tried and condemned Porter.

By this discussion I do not wish to be understood as in any way admitting that General Porter failed to comply strictly with every order which he received, but my object is to show that even had he used discretion and not complied literally with the orders he would under the circumstances have been justified.

In closing this branch of the subject, as confirmatory of the fact that General Porter could be implicitly relied on to execute any order the execution of which was possible or proper, I ask the attention of the House to an extract from the manuscript of General McClellan's forthcoming work, which I will read:

Fitz-John Porter was on duty with General Patterson as adjutant-general when I assumed command. As soon as possible I had him made a brigadier-general, and gave him the command created by W. T. Sherman. Take him for all in all, he was probably the best general officer I had under me. He had excellent ability, sound judgment, and all the instincts of a soldier. He was perfectly familiar with the details of his duty, an excellent organizer and administrative officer, and one of the most conscientious and laborious men I ever knew. I never found it necessary to do more than give him general instructions, for it was certain that all details would be cared for and nothing neglected. I always knew that an order given to him would be fully carried out were it morally and physically possible. He was one of the coolest and most imperturbable men in danger whom I ever knew, like all his race.

Having, as I think, sufficiently discussed the 4.30 order, I propose now to glance hastily at the subsequent events in the order of their sequence. General Pope, evidently irritated at his want of success on the 29th, during that night ordered Porter to join him with his corps and to report in person at his headquarters. This was promptly complied with, and during the night General Porter took position as directed by General Pope.

On the 30th the

was fought, in which nearly all of Pope's army was engaged, but the brunt of the engagement was borne by General Porter, who displayed the same conspicious skill and superb gallantry which had uniformly been characteristic of the man in every one of the numerons actions in which he had ben previously engaged.

General Jackson, in his official report, alluding to this engagement with Porter's corps, uses these words:

In a few moments our entire line was engaged in a fierce and sanguinary struggle with the enemy. As one line was repulsed another took its place and pressed forward as if determined, by force of numbers and fury of assault, to drive us from our positions. So impetuous and well sustained were these onsets as to induce me to send to the commanding general for re-enforcements, but the timely and gallant advance of General Longstreet on the right relieved my troops from the pressure of overwhelming numbers, and gave to those brave men the chances of a more equal conflict. As Longstreet pressed upon the right the Federal advance was checked, and soon a general advance of my whole line was ordered.

General Pope, in his apparent effort to detract from and disparage Porter's services, in his report uses these words:

The attack of Porter was neither vigorous nor persistent, and his troops soon retired in considerable confusion.

I desire to call attention to the fact that in the attack of the Fifth Corps, which General Pope says was "neither vigorous nor persistent," Porter's loss in killed and wounded was, in proportion to the strength of the various corps, nearly double that of any other corps during all the battles and affairs of the campaign which lasted eighteen days.

Porter lost about 2,100 out of less than 8,500 men for the fighting that General Pope styles "neither vigorous nor persistent."

Other corps of General Pope's army lost from August 16 to September 2, inclusive—Sigel 2,087 out of 9,000, Heintzelman 2,238 out of 9,000, Reno 1,523 out of 7,000, McDowell 5,469 out of 18,000; and of these 5,469 more than 2,000 of McDowell's losses were reported as "missing," while Porter's "missing" was only 458.

Worse than that, the extract from Jackson's report which I have just quoted was put in circulation by Porter's detractors, coupled with the assertion that it referred to the engagement of the 29th. This perversion of fact served a double purpose: it produced the false impression in the public mind that a great battle was being fought by General Pope on the 29th when he sent the 4.30 order to Porter, and at the same time deprived the Fifth Corps and its commander of all credit for their intrepid valor.

On the 31st no engagement occurred, but on September 1 General Lee pressed around General Pope's right. Pope attempted to interpose Generals Hooker, Reno, Kearny, and Stevens. A severe engagement followed which was called

THE BATTLE OF CHANTILLY.

The following day, while en route to Washington, General Pope received the following:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 2, 1862.

Major-General POPE, Fairfax Court House, Va.:

You will bring your forces, as best you can, within or near the line of fortifications. General McClellan has charge of all the defenses, and you will consider any direction as to disposition of the troops as they arrive given by him as coming from me. Do not let the enemy get between you and the works.

It is impossible for me to leave Washington.

H. W. HALLECK,
General-in-Chief.

At 7.10 p. m. General Pope dispatches General Halleck from Ball's Cross Roads:

I arrived here safely.

On the 3d General Pope was ordered to report in person at Washington. On the 4th he writes asking to be placed in command of the corps of Generals Banks, McDowell, Reno, and Hooker, and on the 5th he writes a letter to General Halleck, a few extracts from which, which I will read, will assist us to understand the animus of the whole prosecution of which Porter was the victim:

* * * By the present arrangement you are doing me more injury than my worst enemy could do. It is understood and acted upon that I am deprived of my command, and that it is assigned to McClellan.

* * * Again, I understood from you that you intended to publish a complimentary order to my army, for their arduous and difficult services, based upon the telegram you sent me. Your silence since conveys very plainly an unfavorable impression of me to the country. I hope that you will do me the kindness and the justice not to delay the issue of this order.

General Halleck replied:

The President and Secretary both think that no order in relation to the recent battles should be issued at present.

And General Pope was relieved from command by the following order:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 5, 1862.

Major-General POPE, Arlington, Va.:

The armies of the Potomac and Virginia being consolidated, you will report for orders to the Secretary of War.

H. W. HALLECK,
General-in-Chief.

General McClellan, again in command of the army, with Generals Porter, Franklin, Griffin, and other officers of the Army of the Potomac, marched to meet General Lee, fought the battle of South Mountain September 14, and Antietam or Sharpsburg September 17.

To facilitate a thorough understanding and appreciation of these events and their precise relation to each other, I have had some maps prepared to illustrate them.

First. A map embracing the entire field of operations, including the campaign in the valley between Stonewall Jackson on the one side and Banks, Frémont, Shields, and Milroy on the other; also McClellan's operations around Richmond, upon which those interested may trace the route by which McClellan re-enforced Pope and by which Lee transferred his army from Richmond to Manassas and the field at Antietam.

Second. A map marked "Board map No. 1," showing the battle-grounds of August 28, 29, and 30, 1862, in the vicinity of Groveton, drawn from a survey made in June, 1878, by Maj. Gen. G. K. Warren, of the United States Corps of Engineers, by order of Hon. George W. McCrary, Secretary of War. This map shows the probable position of the opposing forces at noon, August 29, 1862, as indicated by the information then in possession of the Union generals.

Third. Longstreet and Williams's map, showing the position of Longstreet's corps at 12 o'clock noon on August 29, also made by General Warren, and its accuracy verified by the before-mentioned survey of June, 1878.

Fourth. Map marked "Board map No. 2," made by the same officer, under the same authority, showing the general situation when General Pope issued the order dated 4.30 p. m. August 29.

Fifth. Map marked "Board map No. 3," by same officer, under same authority, showing the situation as General Pope supposed it to exist when he issued the 4.30 p. m. order to Porter.

Sixth. "Letter-press descriptive," used by the counsel for the Government before the Schofield board.

Seventh. "Illustrated map No. 1," used by the counsel for the Government, and made by same officer under same authority, showing relative positions of the United States and confederate forces at 2 p. m. August 29, as given by the evidence of witnesses at the court-martial in 1862 in the official reports, and laid down on the map by the counsel for the Government.

Eighth. Pope's map, to which is added a diagram, marked "Map A."

The battle of Antietam was more than any important engagement which had, up to this time, taken place, except Grant's victory at Fort Donelson and Porter's victory at Malvern Hill, and coming as it did after a series of disasters to the Federal armies of the West, as well as to those under General Pope in Virginia, the people from Maine to California were exultant in their joy, and while the country was expressing its praise of General McClellan and the officers and soldiers under his command, General Pope, now commanding at Saint Paul, Minn., was writing, and before the end of September had completed and dispatched, a letter to General Halleck, which contained expressions which I will read:

FAVORABLE TO THE FEDERAL ARMY

* * * * * * *

You will excuse a little plain speaking, since it will doubtless be for our mutual benefit. I begin then by saying, that in my judgment every sense of justice and fair dealing as well as a sense of deep personal obligation should have impelled you to sustain me against the machinations of McClellan and his parasites, knowing well, as you did, that the result of the late campaign in Virginia was directly due to the neglect of duty (to call it by no worse name) of these very men.

* * * * * * *

It may be and doubtless was true that, considering the relations between myself and McClellan and many of his followers who held high commands in that army, it was better to change the commander of the armies around Washington, but this fact did not necessitate nor justify, in view of the facts in your possession, that McClellan should be thus advanced, nor that I should be banished to a remote and unimportant command. A great and fatal mistake for the country as for yourself was committed when he was thus assigned.

If you had sustained me, as I had every reason to expect and did expect you would do, you would have had a warm and earnest friend, as I had always been. By yielding to and advancing McClellan you have only put into the hands of an enemy a club to beat your own brains out with. You can never be forgiven for occupying the place you do. You, of course, do not imagine McClellan to be your friend in any sense. Every motive a man can have he has to displace you from your position, which is a constant reproach and humiliation to him. Neither he nor his clique will omit any means to destroy you.

Having at your own urgent request and from a sense of duty laid before the Government the conduct of McClellan, Porter, and Griffin, and substantiated the facts stated by their own written documents, I am not disposed to push the matter further unless the silence of the Government in the midst of the unscrupulous slander and misrepresentation purposely put in circulation against me and the restoration of these officers without trial to their commands, coupled with my banishment to a distant and unimportant department, render it necessary as an act of justice to myself.

* * * * * * *

I need not remind you that when you arrived in Washington I earnestly urged you, as I had before urged the President, to allow me to return to the West. I told you, as I had already told him, that McClellan could not be depended upon to co-operate with me, and that I was sure he would fail me. You insisted upon my remaining, against my repeated requests and my firm conviction that the army under my command would be sacrificed by the very men for whose release from James River it was about to encounter such risk and undergo such hardship.

* * * * * * *

You are a man of the world and you know well that McClellan will never forgive you for superseding him in the command of the army. You stand in the way of a thousand purposes which he and those around him have in view. Your presence as general-in-chief is a constant reproach and mortification to him. Already the journals and people in his interest are representing that he is really commander while you are but a tool in his hands. Such an opinion is entertained even by members of the Cabinet, and everything that has occurred since the 1st of September gives color to such belief. * * *

The next letter from Pope to Halleck seems to exhibit, if possible, a more intensified bitterness and animosity against McClellan, Porter, and Griffin. I will read a few expressions:

* * * Why are McClellan, Porter, and Griffin retained in high command, with such charges of treachery and baseness hanging over them? Do you not believe these charges true? Are they not substantiated to your satisfaction by the papers attached to the report containing them? Did not both you and the President know before the battles at Manassas, from Porter's intercepted dispatches, that he was likely to do precisely what he did? The President himself told me so.

I would not care to press these charges if the Government would only do me the barest justice. Acknowledge publicly as has been done privately by the whole administration, that I did my duty bravely and skillfully in Virginia, and I have nothing further to say about what you do with the criminals who betrayed the country. * * * You assume that I confine my charges to Porter and Griffin. My report tells another story. The greatest criminal is McClellan, and my charge is direct and plain against him. * * * You mistake also when you say that I asked you to put me in command of the reunited Western Department. I said and say now, that one of three things I was entitled to; any one of them would have satisfied me. The dictates of the commonest justice gave me the right to expect one of them, at least:

First. That the court of inquiry be at once held, and the blame be fixed where it belonged. It is now too late for that, as the delay has already made the worst impression against me that is possible.

Second. That the Government should acknowledge publicly as it had done privately my services in Virginia; or Third. That in case neither of these things could be done, then that the Government bestow upon me some mark of public confidence as its opinion of my ability warranted. * * *

It will be very evident to the impartial student of the real merits of this remarkable controversy that General Pope was smarting under the pangs of mortified vanity—a vanity at once morbid and phenomenal—and that the stings to his wounded pride were aggravated and intensified by the criticisms of his conduct occurring in the personal and private letters which General Porter wrote to his old school-mate and West Point friend General Burnside. This honest officer saw that they contained most valuable information, which it was important should be known by General Halleck and the President, and without a thought that they could be used to Porter's detriment hastened to transmit them to Washington.

There was one burning trouble about Porter's letters. They told the truth, and his predictions, so far as they went, proved to be veritable prophecies.

Porter was a thorough soldier. He saw that the effect of Pope's orders and counter-orders, marches and counter-marches, upon some of his subordinates, and even upon the private soldiers, was to produce a paralysis of confusion and bewilderment equal to that which had apparently seized upon the mind of the commanding general. There could be but one termination to such conditions. Porter left Acquia Creek under orders from his superior officer, General Burnside, and until he reached the immediate vicinity of General Pope it was his duty to make his reports to, and receive his orders from, that general. It was in obedience to this duty and in compliance with General Burnside's requests that General Porter supplied him with full, candid, and truthful comments upon the movements and the condition of affairs in the field of active operations upon which he was about entering. The fact that these comments were proved by the event to be both judicious and sagacious, and the further fact that the result thus foreseen and foretold did not reflect credit upon Pope's skill as a commander, constituted the head and front of Porter's offending.

No one would be more prompt than myself to sometimes committed of making ill-natured criticisms of a commander. They tend to lessen the confidence of an army in the commanding general and weaken his power to control and use his troops to the best advantage.

It will be readily seen that neither officers nor soldiers will readily obey orders from a commander whose skill and judgment they distrust; at least there is apt to be a lack of that enthusiastic vim which is so essential to success. But in all the search for evidence of this character against General Porter not one particle has been found. Not one single word could they prove that General Porter uttered regarding General Pope which could be construed into criticism of his orders. Not one of the numerous orders sent to him by General Pope, contradictory as they were, frequently countermanded as they were, difficult of execution as they were, ill-judged as some of them were, sufficed to provoke this exemplary soldier into the slightest expression of disapprobation or criticism. Never did he utter one word regarding them except to direct and command that they should be immediately obeyed. Never did he utter one word indicating that he had any lack of confidence in the ability and skill of General Pope, and most certainly he did not, by the slightest expression, indicate any lack of confidence in his integrity and honor. In this respect, as in many others, General Porter deserves to be held up to the admiration of the country as one of the most striking instances of the successful effort to subordinate natural intelligence and acquired professional knowledge, skill, and experience to convictions of duty, which a distinguished writer has defined thus: "The grand idea of duty is self-constraint exercised for some noble end." Here we have duty rigidly discharged under the most trying circumstances, with no other "noble end" in view than to do all that was possible to promote the success of his commander.

General Grant, after his exhaustive examination of the case, failed to find any evidence that Porter had expressed any lack of confidence. On the contrary, to his mind, Porter was zealous in giving support to General Pope.

Would to God we could say as much for the conduct of General Pope. I will not afflict the House with his reiterated expressions of unseemly disparagement of both superiors and subordinates. It is not necessary. His order to his army, which I have read, was an insult to every other officer in the armies serving in the State of Virginia.

His letters to General Halleck boast that when General Halleck first came to Washington, and therefore before General Halleck assumed command of the armies, that their common superior, General McClellan, could not be depended upon to co-operate with him, and that General McClellan would fail him. This was an open and explicit charge of treason against this great general, who was then the superior of both himself and General Halleck. General Pope also admits that he had made the same charge against McClellan to President Lincoln.

HE OPENLY CHARGED

Pope asks, in a letter to Halleck:

Why are McClellan, Porter, and Griffin retained in command with such charge of treachery and baseness hanging over them?

He also says:

The greatest criminal is McClellan. My charge is direct and plain against him.

But he says:

Acknowledge publicly, as has been done privately by the whole administration, that I did my duty bravely and skillfully in Virginia, and I have nothing further to say about what you do with the criminals who betrayed the country.

These expressions were made regarding the general who had won Antietam and South Mountain and was then commanding the Army of the Potomac.

Can the gentlemen who oppose this bill point out anything said or written by General Porter which approximates these improprieties?

You have had all the power and agencies of the strongest Government on earth at your disposal for twenty-three years, and you have not been able to do it.

You have neglected nothing. Certainly it might have been presumed that when contradictory, ill-judged and conflicting orders reached Porter, he, in some unguarded moment, would have been betrayed into some impatient or thoughtless word. Unfortunately for the prosecution, Porter was so thorough a soldier and so perfect a man that this hope of the prosecution was blasted.

In all Porter's letters to Pope he is respectful, subordinate, and uncomplaining.

When the order comes to start his tired corps at 1 o'clock at night, the evidence is:

General Porter spoke rather decidedly, that there was the order—it must be obeyed; that those who gave the order knew whether the necessities of the case would warrant the exertions that had to be made to comply with it.

We are chided because of our determination in this matter, and the question is asked, Why such earnestness in favor of the bill by those who

and with equal earnestness opposed him?

This, Mr. Speaker, is as it should be. It is but a repetition of the true exposition of honest nature. True human nature is the same now that it was in the earliest stages of written history. It was the same two thousand years ago that it is to-day. St. Paul was the most zealous of all the persecutors of the Christians, but when he learned the truth he became the greatest of the apostles of Christ. Read these words from his epistle to the Galatians:

For ye have heard of my manner of life in time past in the Jew's religion; how that beyond measure I persecuted the church of God, and made havoc of it.

And from his first epistle to the Corinthians:

For I am the least of the apostles, that am not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God. But by the grace of God I am what I am: and His grace which was bestowed upon me was not found vain; but I labored more than they all.

Was there a man who was more thoroughly convinced of the guilt of Porter, and the justice of his punishment, than Major-General Terry, the hero of Fort Fisher? And is there a man now who feels more keenly his absolute innocence?

General Terry had always been a Republican; his associations had been largely with those whose interest led them to use every effort to convince those around them of Porter's guilt, and a life of fifteen years in that atmosphere had made an impression upon General Terry which seemed indelible. Such was his prejudice that when he received the order to serve on the board he wrote that his feelings were so settled and fixed that he could not do Porter justice. Notwithstanding that letter General Terry was peremptorily directed to comply with the order. He listened to and studied the evidence, and this educated lawyer and experienced soldier upon his oath said General Porter was not guilty. On August 26, 1879, he wrote to General Porter:

It is not thanks but pardon I should ask from you. For years I did you wrong in thought and sometimes in speech. It is true that this was through ignorance; but I had not the right to be so ignorant; I might have learned something at least of the truth had I diligently sought it. If you find anything in my action as a member of the board which you can accept as an atonement for the wrong which I did you I shall be more than gratified.

Generals Schofield and Getty were substantially in the same attitude, and when they had completed their labors they all, Schofield, Terry, and Getty, made their report, in which they say:

These charges and specifications certainly bear no discernible resemblance to the facts of the case as now established. Yet it has been our duty to carefully compare with these facts the views entertained by the court-martial, as shown in the findings and in the review of the case which was prepared for the information of the President by the Judge-Advocate-General, who had conducted the prosecution, and thus to clearly perceive every error into which the court-martial was led. We trust it is not necessary for us to submit in detail the results of this comparison, and that it will be sufficient for us to point out the fundamental errors, and to say that all the essential facts in every instance stand out in clear and absolute contrast to those supposed facts upon which General Porter was adjudged guilty.

The fundamental errors upon which the conviction of General Porter depended may be summed up in few words. It was maintained, and apparently established to the satisfaction of the court-martial, that only about one-half of the confederate army was on the field of Manassas on the 29th of August, while General Lee, with the other half, was still beyond the Bull Run Mountains; that General Pope's army, exclusive of Porter's corps, was engaged in a severe and nearly equal contest with the enemy, and only needed the aid of a flank attack which Porter was expected to make to insure the defeat and destruction or capture of the confederate force in their front under General Jackson; that McDowell and Porter, with their joint forces, Porter's leading, had advanced towards Gainesville until the head of their column had reached a point near the Warrenton turnpike, where they found a division of confederate troops, "seventeen regiments," which Buford had counted as they passed through Gainesville, marching along the road across Porter's front and going toward the field of battle at Groveton; that McDowell ordered Porter to at once attack that column thus moving to join Jackson, or the flank and rear of the line if they had formed in line, while he would take his own troops by the Sudley Springs road and throw them upon the enemy's center near Groveton; that Porter, McDowell having then separated from him, disobeyed that order to attack, allowed that division of the enemy's troops to pass him unmolested, and then fell back and retreated toward Manassas Junction; that Porter then remained in the rear all the afternoon, listening to the sounds of battle and coolly contemplating a presumed defeat of his comrades on the center and right of the field; that this division of the enemy having passed Porter's column and formed on the right of Jackson's line near Groveton, an order was sent to Porter to attack the right flank or rear of the enemy's line, upon which his own line of march must bring him, but that he had willfully disobeyed, and made no attempt to execute that order; that in this way was lost the opportunity to destroy Jackson's detached force before the other wing of General Lee's army could join it, and that this junction having been effected during the night of the 29th, the defeat of General Pope's army on the 30th thus resulted from General Porter's neglect and disobedience.

Now, in contrast to these fundamental errors the following all-important facts are fully established:

As Porter was advancing toward Gainesville, and while yet nearly 4 miles from that place and more than 2 miles from the nearest point of the Warrenton turnpike, he met the right wing of the confederate army, twenty-five thousand strong, which had arrived on the field that morning and was already in line of battle. Not being at that moment quite fully informed of the enemy's movements, and being then under orders from Pope to push rapidly toward Gainesville, Porter was pressing forward to attack the enemy in his front, when McDowell arrived on the field with later information of the enemy, and later and very different orders from Pope, assumed the command, and arrested Porter's advance. This latter information left no room for doubt that the main body of Lee's army was already on the field and far in advance of Pope's army in preparation for battle. General McDowell promptly decided not to attempt to go farther to the front, but to deploy his column so as to form line in connection with General Pope's right wing, which was then engaged with Jackson. To do this General McDowell separated his corps entirely from General Porter's, and thus relinquished the command and all right to the command of Porter's corps. McDowell did not give Porter any order to attack, nor did he give him any order whatever to govern his action after their separation.

It does not appear from the testimony that he conveyed to General Porter in any way the erroneous view of the military situation which was afterward maintained before the court-martial, nor that he suggested to General Porter any expectation that he would make an attack. On the contrary, the testimony of all the witnesses as to what was actually said and done, the information which McDowell and Porter then had respecting the enemy, and the movement which McDowell decided to make, and did make, with his own troops, prove conclusively that there was left no room for doubt in Porter's mind that his duty was to stand on the defensive and hold his position until McDowell's movement could be completed. It would have indicated a great error of military judgment to have done or ordered the contrary, in the situation as then fully known to both McDowell and Porter.

General Pope appears from his orders and from his testimony to have been at that time wholly ignorant of the true situation. He had disapproved of the sending of Ricketts to Thoroughfare Gap to meet Longstreet on the 28th, believing that the main body of Lee's army could not reach the field of Manassas before the night of the 30th. Hence he sent the order to Porter, dated 4.30 p. m., to attack Jackson's right flank or rear. Fortunately that order did not reach Porter until about sunset, too late for any attack to be made. Any attack which Porter could have made at any time that afternoon must necessarily have been fruitless of any good result.

Porter's faithful, subordinate, and intelligent conduct that afternoon saved the Union army from the defeat which would otherwise have resulted that day from the enemy's more speedy concentration. The only seriously critical period of that campaign, namely, between 11 a. m. and sunset of August 29, was thus safely passed. Porter had understood and appreciated the military situation, and, so far as he had acted upon his own judgment, his action had been wise and judicious. For the disaster of the succeeding day he was in no degree responsible. Whosoever else may have been responsible, it did not flow from any action or inaction of his.

The judgment of the court-martial upon General Porter's conduct was evidently based upon greatly erroneous impressions, not only respecting what that conduct really was and the orders under which he was acting, but also respecting all the circumstances under which he acted. Especially was this true in respect to the character of the battle of the 29th of August. That battle consisted of a number of sharp and gallant combats between small portions of the opposing forces. Those combats were of short duration, and were separated by long intervals of simple skirmishing and artillery duels. Until after 6 o'clock only a small part of the troops on either side were engaged at any time during the afternoon. Then, about sunset, one additional division on each side was engaged near Groveton. The musketry of that last contest and the yells of the confederate troops about dark were distinctly heard by the officers of Porter's corps; but at no other time during all that afternoon was the volume of musketry such that it could be heard at the position of Porter's troops. No sound but that of artillery was heard by them during all those hours when Porter was understood by the court-martial to have been listening to the sounds of a furious battle raging immediately to his right. And those sounds of artillery were by no means such as to indicate a general battle.

The reports of the 29th and those of the 30th of August have somehow been strangely confounded with each other. Even the confederate reports have since the termination of the war been similarly misconstrued. Those of the 30th have been misquoted as referring to the 29th, thus to prove that a furious battle was going on while Porter was comparatively inactive on the 29th. The fierce and gallant struggle of his own troops on the 30th has thus been used to sustain the original error under which he was condemned. General Porter was in effect condemned for not having taken any part in his own battle. Such was the error upon which General Porter was pronounced guilty of the most shameful crime known among soldiers. We believe not one among all the gallant soldiers on that bloody field was less deserving of such condemnation than he.

And this complete exoneration of General Porter is supplemented by the following statement of opinion as to the duty of the Government:

Having thus given the reasons for our conclusions, we have the honor to report, in accordance with the President's order, that, in our opinion, justice requires at his hands such action as may be necessary to annul and set aside the findings and sentence of the court-martial in the case of Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter, and to restore him to the positions of which that sentence deprived him—such restoration to take effect from the date of his dismissal from service.

The minority of the Military Committee appear anxious to weaken the force and effect of this sweeping and complete vindication of General Porter, and as a means of accomplishing this they inform the House that the witnesses before the Schofield board were not sworn, and that there was no process of subpœna at the command of the recorder. In the first of these statements the minority of the committee is mistaken, as the record shows that the witnesses were all sworn, and gave every word of their testimony under oath. Regarding the second statement, I shall only say that the only thing in the record which justifies an inference of any lack of power in the recorder is the fact that he failed to compel the attendance of General Pope as a witness.

The minority also volunteer the information to the House that the board was organized to Porter's entire liking. This novel discovery is conveyed in these words:

With a board organized to his entire liking.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] says:

"Well, but," you say, "Terry and Schofield and Getty acquitted Porter." So they did, but how?

In the first place, Porter had three as eminent lawyers as there are in this country to take charge of his case. Then they had the selection of the jury, of the court, which meant Schofield, for he was the whole court. All honor to General Terry. He is a brave, conscientious, able, and learned man. I have not a word to say against him or General Getty. But you can see by examining the testimony that Schofield took charge.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] says:

The Schofield board was organized to acquit and then ordered to try.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it would be impossible to make an assertion more directly opposed to the actual facts connected with the composition of the board. It was composed of one major-general, one brigadier-general, and one colonel, and the selection of the officers was in the hands of a Republican administration. There were but three major-generals in the Army—Hancock, Schofield, and McDowell—the last named not being eligible. Hancock was an acknowledged Democrat, while Schofield had been a Cabinet officer under two Republican administrations, and it was notorious that there must have been some good ground for the judgment of the court-martial which condemned Porter, and that while Secretary of War he, like Grant, and no doubt controlled by the same considerations, had felt it to be his duty to decline General Porter's application to him to invoke the President's action in his (Porter's) behalf.

It was also publicly known that General Schofield's official and personal relations with both Generals Pope and McDowell were of an agreeable and friendly character.

It was also a matter of record that prior to these events circumstances had occurred between Porter and Schofield in which Schofield's friends unanimously felt that Porter had done great injustice to Schofield.

It is reasonable to suppose that the persons who advised Mr. Hayes as to the formation of the board felt that these facts justified them in the belief that Schofield was unfriendly to Porter; and they knew so little of the character of the great soldier who had commanded the Army of the Ohio during the most critical period of the war, and to whose skill and heroism the country was indebted for the victory at Franklin, as to suppose that any personal feeling could influence his action in a judicial capacity.

Had these persons consulted with Schofield's associates as a cadet or as an officer in the Army, or had they studied his career, they would have learned that his personal integrity and honor were of the very highest of that high order which, with the fewest exceptions, has always characterized and distinguished the officers of the Army of the United States.

There was a broader field in which to select the brigadier, but the choice made shows that the administration was determined that Porter should not enjoy any possible advantage through political sympathy. General Terry, as I have already shown, was, by the associations of years and the prejudices of a lifetime, bound to the party in power, and, as his letters clearly prove, held decided opinions adverse to any theory of Porter's possible innocence. Similar circumspection was manifested in selecting the remaining officer of the board. Getty was known to have the same feelings and opinions relative to the case as Terry. Indeed, so strong was his prejudice that he himself has said:

It was with no pleasant feelings that I [he] received the order to sit as a member of the board to investigate the case of Fitz-John Porter, for the reason that I [he] believed then that General Porter was guilty of the charges of which he was convicted by the general court-martial.

In calling the attention of the House to the composition of the board of investigation I have not intended to reflect in any manner upon those charged with its appointment. I have merely sought to emphasize the significance of the conclusions reached by a board consisting of gentlemen who avowedly entertained strong prejudices against General Porter. And my statements regarding the political and personal bias of the members of the board were forced upon me by the erroneous assertions of the minority of the committee.

While I will not follow their example and insult the appointing powers by saying that they appointed the board to obtain a prearranged verdict, I will say that if they had sought the records of every major-general, every brigadier-general, and every colonel in the Army to find an officer of each of the above grades whose history and known sentiments regarding this case were of a character to justify the belief that their bias was all against Porter and in favor of Pope and McDowell, their investigation would have unerringly pointed to the very men who were selected by them to compose the board.

My colleague on that committee [Mr. STEELE] also says, referring to the court-martial which condemned Porter:

If Porter had friends in the Army they were on that court. * * * They were his intimate associates. Seven members of that court were graduates of West Point, fellow-students or fellow-classmates of Porter's.

I simply refer to this to show how inaccurate the minority of the committee are in their assertions.

Seven members were not graduates of West Point. They were not intimate associates of Porter. None of them were Porter's classmates. None of them were Porter's fellow-students. Those who did graduate at West Point left there years before Porter entered that institution, and I believe most of them were appointed cadets before Porter was born.

The gentleman [Mr. STEELE] also says, referring to the court-martial which condemned Porter:

* * * The judge-advocate is not only counsel for the prosecution, but counsel also for the defense in military courts. It is his duty, and he is sworn to do his duty fairly.

The fact is that Judge Holt, so far from doing his duty fairly, as the gentleman says his oath required, deceived and imposed upon Mr. Lincoln by not presenting a brief of facts, but an argument, which will be found printed, occupying pages 280 to 300 inclusive of the record.

In this argument

and undue force and weight are given to evidence which is against him. Porter had no knowledge of its existence until after the proceedings were confirmed by the President; and, taking it all in all, it was one of the most disreputable transactions which ever entered into court-martial proceedings.

Judge Holt's pretended summary of the case upon which Mr. Lincoln relied exclusively in reaching a decision may be, and doubtless is, an ingenious, able, specious, and artful piece of special pleading, designed to compass the condemnation of the accused, but I defy any one to read it and say that it is, or could have been, intended to enable the President, as the reviewing officer, to reach through its agency an exact knowledge of the evidence presented on the trial, or to gain that fair and unbiased knowledge of the facts which would have resulted in impartial justice to Porter.

The testimony of five officers upon an important question of fact is contemptuously rejected, and that of a courier accepted as more credible and trustworthy, and for no apparent reason but that the courier's story may be tortured to Porter's discredit, while the statement of the officers must inevitably redound to his advantage.

This method of presenting evidence is so monstrous that I can readily imagine any one demanding proof of its accuracy, and I therefore refer to pages 291 and 293 of the record.

This is only a specimen of the whole argument. It bristles all through, from the first line to the last, with the animus—not to say the malice—of the prosecuting attorney more anxious to secure the personal triumph of a verdict adverse to the accused than of the upright and conscientious lawyer who was only solicitous to see justice done to all parties to the suit.

To illustrate the enormity and criminality of Judge Holt's conduct, and the extent of his offense against the rights of General Porter, I assert that if in my State a lawyer in closing even a civil case had so perverted the evidence—had so wantonly suppressed the true and suggested the false—the judge would have been justified in rebuking him in the severest terms and in setting aside any verdict so procured, and had he failed to do so any appellate court would have reversed the verdict.

Judge Holt knew that if the argument submitted to the President had been made in open court it would have aroused the indignation of the country, and he therefore adopted a secret and underhand method of imposing upon and misleading the honest, confiding, and unsuspicious Abraham Lincoln.

I have not alluded to the illegality of the court, as that question has heretofore been elaborately discussed, and it has been shown that the order convening the court was illegal.

The manner of proceeding was illegal, and the method of lacing the record before the President not only illegal but disgraceful.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] claim that a distinguished soldier stated that the members of this House could not understand the case.

THIS DISTINGUISHED SOLDIER MEANT that many of them would not understand it. They would not read the facts or listen to the arguments.

A large number of the members of this House were soldiers, and many of them of marked distinction, and all will testify that military business, to be successful, like all other affairs of life, should be conducted upon the plainest requirements of common sense.

The recognition and application of the fundamental principle that when two forces meet the greater will prevail was the leading idea which gave victories to Napoleon, Grant, Lee, Stonewall Jackson, and General Porter.

When armies are confronting each other the commanding-general who first learns the point of battle, and places there a superior force, will of necessity prevail at that point, and other conditions being equal he will be victorious. That superior force may be excess of men, excess of vigor, excess of courage, application of machinery, construction of mines, like Grant's effort at Petersburg, or it may be a combination of some or all of these elements.

It was hard common sense and the habit of seeking truth and looking at things as they really were which made Grant a successful soldier, and it was an honest effort to learn the truth which caused him to take the action he did in this case.

It was sound common sense combined with personal courage which made Generals Sheridan and Hancock so distinguished. The statements made on this floor that either of these great generals would have forced their troops into action when defeat was certain, or even when no advantage could be gained, is a reflection upon them which I utterly refute. They were not Fourth-of-July soldiers. They were practical, great, and able men.

The leader of the minority [Mr. STEELE] explains to the Forty-ninth Congress why General Pope refused to go before the Schofield board. His opinion seems to be that Pope could not stand being examined by the lawyers.

The gentleman says:

I would not have gone there and been in his boots in the hands of such counsel as Porter had.

This is the first instance on record where a general in the Army feared testifying to the truth, or feared being examined regarding his own conduct toward a fellow-officer. General Pope had made so many mistakes in his evidence and his reports and his expressions and his various brief-printed statements, that it would probably have been embarrassing for them all to be presented to him at the same time.

Let us recall a few, beginning with the first: On August 28 General Pope told Porter he had arrived in time, and on September 2 General

Pope declared in General Ruggles's presence that he was satisfied with Porter's explanation, and yet soon after he caused charges to be preferred against Porter regarding these same occurrences.

General Pope's evidence as to his satisfaction with the manner in which Porter complied with the order of August 27 (to move to Bristoe Station at 1 o'clock at night), and General Pope's admission that Porter had reached him at Bristoe at 8 o'clock on the morning of the 28th, and that he (Porter) had arrived in time, and that he (Porter) had given him an account of his march and the difficulties he had in getting through the wagon train will be found in the record of the court-martial which condemned Porter, reprinted in the proceedings of the Schofield board, part 1, top page 19, side page 18.

General Ruggles's evidence, that on September 2 General Pope expressed himself as satisfied with General Porter's explanation of all that had occurred up to that date, will be found in the record of the Porter court-martial, reprinted in the proceedings of the Schofield board, top page 150, side page 155. And General Pope's evidence to the same effect will be found on top page 23, side page 22, where he admits under oath that "I [he] did not at that time (September 2) believe that General Porter deliberately and of purpose had withheld his command from the assistance of the army engaged in that battle" (the battle of August 29).

This answers fully the inquiry of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM].

It shows that at 8 o'clock on the morning of the 28th Pope fully approved of Porter's exercise of discretion regarding the execution of the order of the night previous, expressing his approval in the declaration to Porter that there had been no necessity for an earlier appearance of his corps. And it shows further, that as late as September 2 General Pope proclaimed in the presence of witnesses that he was satisfied with Porter's explanation.

General Pope dispatched to General Halleck at 5 a. m., August 30 (War Records, volume 12, part 3, page 741):

> We fought a terrific battle here yesterday with the combined forces of the enemy, which lasted with continuous fury from daylight until dark. * * * Our troops behaved splendidly.

I think I have shown that no furious battle commenced until late in the afternoon.

When General Pope

THOUGHT IT TO HIS ADVANTAGE

to show that Longstreet was not on the field, and did not interpose and prevent Porter's attack on Jackson's flank, he contradicted this dispatch, and stated in his report and swore before the Porter court that he did not fight the combined forces, but that Longstreet was absent.

At 9.45 p. m. the same day he dispatched (War Records, volume 12, part 2, page 78):

> We have had a terrific battle again to-day. The enemy, largely re-enforced, assaulted our position early to-day. We held our ground firmly until 6 p. m., when the enemy, massing very heavy forces on our left, forced back that wing about half a mile. The movement has been made in perfect order and without loss. The troops are in good heart, and marched off the field without the least hurry or confusion. Their conduct was very fine. The battle was most furious for hours without cessation and the losses on both sides very heavy.

Porter's troops did most of the fighting, and General Pope says:

> Their conduct was very fine.

But when he wished to sacrifice Porter he says:

> The attack of Porter was neither vigorous nor persistent, and his troops soon retired in considerable confusion.

To make the court legal it was necessary for General Pope to testify that he was not the prosecutor; but in 1865 he wrote to Senator Wade that he had brought Porter to justice.

And his letter to General Grant of September 16, 1867, says:

> As I am one of the principal parties concerned in the case of Fitz-John Porter,

Probably the most painful thing that General Pope escaped in refusing to go before the Schofield board was the embarrassment of the exposure of his injury to Porter by palming off Stonewall Jackson's report of his battle with Porter on the 30th as Jackson's report of his fight with Pope's other troops on the 29th. No one ought to vote on this bill without reading the evidence of General McDowell before the Schofield board. (Pages 722 to 740, and side pages 751 to 771.)

There it will be seen that in 1878 Generals Pope and McDowell, in their efforts to injure Porter, sought to show that there was a severe battle on the 29th. They therefore take an extract of General Jackson's report, which relates to on the 30th, and change it so as to make it appear to refer to the battle of the 29th. The paragraph is in the following words (War Records, volume 12, part 2, page 646):

> On the following day (30th) my command occupied the ground and the divisions the same relative position to each other and to the field which they held the day before, forming the left wing of the army, General Longstreet's command forming the right wing. A large quantity of artillery was posted upon a commanding eminence in the center. After some desultory skirmishing and heavy cannonading during the day the Federal infantry, about 4 o'clock in the evening, moved from under cover of the wood and advanced in several lines, first engaging the right, but soon extending its attack to the center and left. In a few moments our entire line was engaged in a fierce and sanguinary struggle with the enemy. As one line was repulsed another took its place and pressed forward as if determined by force of numbers and fury of assault to drive us from our position.
> So impetuous and well-sustained were these onsets as to induce me to send to the commanding general for re-enforcements, but the timely and gallant advance of General Longstreet on the right relieved my troops from the pressure of overwhelming numbers and gave to those brave men the chances of a more equal conflict. As Longstreet pressed upon the right the Federal advance was checked, and soon a general advance of my whole line was ordered. Eagerly and fiercely did each brigade press forward, exhibiting in parts of the field scenes of close encounter and murderous strife not witnessed often in the turmoil of battle. The Federals gave way before our troops, fell back in disorder, and fled precipitately, leaving their dead and wounded on the field. During their retreat the artillery opened with destructive power upon the fugitive masses. The infantry followed until darkness put an end to the pursuit.

This they change by omitting the first four lines, which show that it refers to the 30th, and place a heading above that and other reports, as follows:

OPERATIONS OF THE 29TH OF AUGUST—SECOND BULL RUN.

And, in order to more thoroughly impress this deception upon the public, Pope says:

> And here we shall recite the testimony of Stonewall Jackson, who was the general commanding-in-chief on that day.

This was in full keeping with the methods by which General Pope misled General Grant, who, in excusing his failure to do Porter justice in 1867, says he read the other side as prepared and furnished by General Pope. It was perpetrated by the same man to whom Major-General Franklin refers in a letter which I find in the Schofield board report, page 489. I will read an extract:

> During the trial I thought it proper to inform Porter that General J. F. Reynolds, George H. Thomas, and myself would, if requested, go before the court and swear that we would not believe Pope or Roberts under oath. I had consulted General Reynolds before I wrote the proposition. He consented to go himself, and thought General Thomas would have no hesitation in giving such evidence. I was myself well convinced of General Thomas's opinion of Pope's veracity from what I had often heard him say before the war. Porter declined to call us up to give this evidence, on the ground that the court appeared so well-disposed toward him and his case was going on so well that he did not wish to irritate the court by an attempt to break down the evidence of the principal prosecutors. The sequel showed that he made a serious mistake.

I fully concur with my colleague [Mr. STEELE] that General Pope showed good judgment in keeping away from the Schofield board; and I am not surprised at the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] saying that he would not like to be in General Pope's boots as a witness before that board.

I suppose he read General McDowell's evidence about the change of the date in Jackson's report, and no doubt he readily conceived that General Pope's position would have been even more embarrassing than General McDowell's.

So far from the board being organized in Porter's favor, I feel justified in the conclusion that they were expected to reach a decision which would be substantially, if not literally, an indorsement of the verdict of the court-martial. That this expectation was widespread, if not general, is clearly established by innumerable letters upon the subject, from the mass of which I select a few extracts from the correspondence of the late President Garfield as sufficient for my purpose.

On the 18th of January, 1875, General Garfield, then the leader of his party in this House, introduced a resolution looking to the appointment by the President of a board of Army officers to examine the new evidence said to be in the possession of General Porter, and to report what bearing such evidence would have on the findings and sentence of the court-martial in his case. On the 19th of February he wrote a letter to General Porter, stating or explaining his reasons for introducing that resolution, and in this letter he says:

> I have never concurred in the severe reflections which have from time to time appeared in the public press on the motives and conduct of that court.

On February 18, 1880, he wrote to General Cox:

> I have made a strong effort to separate myself from the case.

On the 13th of February, 1880, he wrote:

> If the Fitz-John Porter bill passes it condemns hundreds of leading men, from Lincoln down, and leaves a blot on their name.

And in the letter to General Cox, previously referred to, he says:

> I have been so stung by the decision of the Schofield board that it is very hard to trust my own mind to speak of it as it appeared to me.

General Garfield dreaded that the Fitz-John Porter bill, if passed, would "condemn hundreds of leading men, from Lincoln down, and leave a blot on their names."

Is it not manifest from the language employed that Garfield spoke as a party man, not as a lawyer; that his view was that of an advocate and champion of his party, not that of an unbiased citizen anxious to secure justice for the victim of unavoidable error?

I wish it to be distinctly understood that I allude to the distinguished dead

WITH ALL POSSIBLE RESPECT AND REVERENCE, and have introduced his name only because the views he was known to hold upon this case have been advanced as lending a peculiar and special sanction to the opposition to this bill. But it must not be forgotten that, notwithstanding his many great and good qualities, General Garfield, according to his own explicit avowal, was never able to separate himself from the case.

But notwithstanding all this, I am convinced that had General Garfield been relieved of the excitement and responsibilities of party leadership long enough to have given to the case that careful, thorough, and dispassionate consideration without which it was impossible to understand or appreciate the just weight and bearing of the new evidence produced before the Schofield board—had this been possible, I say, I am convinced he would have earnestly, zealously, and efficiently supported the act of justice sought to be secured by the bill under consideration.

We all know the extreme and intense feeling of President Lincoln against General Porter. His son, then a child, recalled this in 1870, when before the board he testified:

My father was exceedingly severe in his condemnation.

Yet Mr. Lincoln, at the first glimpse of facts showing he was in error, said to Governor Newell that he had acted upon the opinion of Judge Holt, and that he would be glad to give General Porter an opportunity of presenting the new evidence which exculpated him. Governor Newell was upon intimate and friendly terms with Mr. Lincoln, both personal and political. The governor, while a witness, in reply to direct questions, testified to the above, and in reply to a question from the court testified regarding Mr. Lincoln's statement in these words:

Mr. Lincoln stated that he had not been able to give that personal attention to the cause which its merits required; that he had accepted the opinion of the Judge-Advocate-General and of the War Department as the basis of his action; that if any evidence exculpatory of General Porter could be introduced, he would be very glad to give him an opportunity to have it presented; that he had a high regard for General Porter personally and as a soldier, and that he hoped he would be able to vindicate himself in that way.

This shows that Mr. Lincoln himself, as shown by the evidence of Mr. Newell, expressed the greatest contrition when he found that he had been deceived and imposed upon by Judge Holt and induced to affirm a verdict he otherwise would have set aside. The gentleman from Indiana says that Judge Holt——

Mr. HANBACK. Upon what authority do you make that statement?

Mr. WHEELER. I make it upon the authority of Governor Newell, of New Jersey, who swore before the Schofield board to that effect.

Mr. HANBACK. It has been denied a thousand times by honorable men.

Mr. WHEELER. It has never been denied under oath by anybody. I assert that so far from it being the fact, as has been stated here, that Mr. Lincoln considered this evidence, he never saw it at all, but, as I have before stated, relied upon that paper presented by Judge Holt. Though it was his sworn duty to defend the accused, General Porter, yet he presented to Mr. Lincoln a written paper occupying twenty pages printed matter which is one of the basest arguments, false in its statements and deceptive in its inferences, that was ever placed before a court by any lawyer. If in my State a lawyer before a court and jury had made such an argument, perverting facts as he did, the judge would have set aside the verdict if one had been obtained, or, if he did not do it, the supreme court would have reversed it. Yet, while it was Judge Holt's duty to do the defendant justice, he declined to make his argument before the court, and then placed this argument before the President.

Mr. STEELE. If the gentleman will allow me, the facts are these——

Mr. WHEELER. No, I can not allow you, because I have very little time. You can take some other time for your statement.

Mr. STEELE. I need not remind the gentleman that he interrupted me ad libitum the other day.

Mr. WHEELER. I did not occupy a minute.

My colleague on the committee [Mr. STEELE] also seems never to have heard of this, as he said in his speech:

President Lincoln, who had the case in his hands at least two days—and it is attested that he carefully reviewed it—approved the sentence.

On the contrary, what I have read shows, and my information is, that Mr. Lincoln did not review the evidence. I have shown that Governor William A. Newell, of New Jersey, testified to this fact in his evidence before the Schofield board, which may be found on pages 318 to 321, part 2, of the Schofield board.

On one point the evidence of Governor Newell is specially clear and emphatic, and that was as to Mr. Lincoln's desire to have General Porter submit any new evidence, which I will read:

Q. Did he at that time state what kind of newly discovered evidence or explanatory evidence he desired?

A. No, sir; he made no inquiry about that. I didn't know anything about that myself. I recollect his saying distinctly, and his manner of putting it at the time, that if there was any evidence that General Porter could bring to change the aspect of the case he would be glad to have it done. I recollect perfectly his particular expression at that time—I recollect that more than anything else—that if there was anything that could be brought out he hoped it would be done.

GENERAL GRANT'S PREJUDICE against Porter was so great that in 1866 he refused Porter's application to even recommend any action which would tend to open a way for a new investigation, and for eighteen years this distinguished soldier admitted he had entertained and expressed opinions reflecting upon the integrity of General Porter's military acts; yet, immediately after reading the evidence, General Grant writes, December 9, 1881:

I have heretofore done you injustice both in thought and speech, and I will regard it as a most solemn obligation on my part to correct the wrong.

And two weeks later, December 22, 1881, General Grant writes to the President:

The reading of the whole of this record has thoroughly convinced me that for these nineteen years I have been doing a gallant and efficient soldier a very great injustice in thought, and sometimes in speech. I feel it incumbent upon me now to do whatever lies in my power to remove from him and from his family the stain upon his good name. I feel this the more incumbent upon me than I should if I had been a corps commander only, or occupying any other command in the Army than the one which I did; but as General I had it possibly in my power to have obtained for him the hearing which he only got at a later day, and as President I certainly had the power to have ordered that hearing. In justification for my injustice to General Porter, I can only state that shortly after the war closed his defense was brought to my attention, but I read it in connection with a sketch of the field where his offenses were said to have been committed, which I now see, since perfect maps have been made by the Engineer Department of the whole field, were totally incorrect as showing the position of the two armies. I also read it in connection with statements made on the other side against General Porter, and I am afraid possibly with some little prejudice in the case. * * * I am now convinced that he rendered faithful, efficient, and intelligent service, and the fact that he was retained in command of a corps for months after his offenses were said to have been committed is in his favor.

On December 30, in reply to a letter from General LOGAN, Grant says:

I reluctantly came to the conclusion I did, but was convinced beyond all preconceived notions, and felt it due to an accused man to say so.

On January 23, 1882, he wrote to the President:

But, as I feel myself somewhat responsible for General Porter's long suffering, I ask an interview with one of his personal friends, to the end that you may consult as to the best method of reaching a just and practical solution of the Porter case, if you should look upon the matter as I do.

On February 4, 1882, he writes to Senator CAMERON:

* * * When I commenced the examination of the Fitz-John Porter case, as it now stands, it was with the conviction that his sentence was a just one, and that his punishment had been light for so hideous an offense; but I tried to throw off all prejudice in the case and to examine it on its merits. I came out of that examination with the firm conviction that an entirely innocent man had been most unjustly punished. * * *

You are aware that when General LOGAN made a speech against General Porter it was in opposition to a bill pending in Congress. He, like myself, was thoroughly convinced of the guilt of General Porter, and was, therefore, opposed to the bill. His investigations, therefore, were necessarily to find arguments to sustain his side of a pending question. I have, of course, no knowledge of the papers he could refer to, or would examine, to find such arguments, but I know he could have the testimony which was taken before the court-martial which convicted, probably also the arguments of the officer who acted as prosecutor when the case was before the Schofield court, and arguments that have been made by lawyers J. D. Cox, and others possibly—all of which were made in opposition to General Porter, as much as that of paid attorneys in cases of civil courts.

But my investigation of all the facts that I could bring before me of the occurrences from the 27th of August, 1862, and for some little time prior to the 1st of September the same year, show conclusively that the court and some of the witnesses entirely misapprehended the position of the enemy on the 29th of August.

* * * * * * *

I find the Schofield board acquit him entirely, but throw some censure upon him for having expressed a lack of confidence in his commanding officer. Such conduct might be censured, although if every man in the Army had been punished who had expressed lack of confidence in his superior officer many of our best soldiers would have been punished. But, in fact, if this was not stated in the summing up of the case by the board, I should have not found that he had expressed any such lack of confidence. On the contrary, to my mind now he was zealous in giving a support to General Pope, and more so, possibly, for the reason that he knew among his former Army associates there was a good deal of apprehension, to say the least, of his fitness for his new place.

* * * * * * *

I commenced reading up this case with the conviction that General Porter had been guilty, as found by the court, but come out of the investigation with a thorough conviction that I and the public generally had done him a fearful injustice, and entirely satisfied that any intelligent man or lawyer who will throw aside prejudice and examine the case as I have done will come to the same conclusion.

As stated in my letter to the President, I feel it incumbent upon me, in view of the positions that I have held heretofore and my failure then to do what I now wish I had done, to do all in my power to place General Porter right before the public and in future history, and to repair my own unintentional injustice.

I address this letter to you, knowing that you will have a desire to do just what your judgment dictates as being right in the matter, and that you will state to whomsoever it may seem to you proper and necessary my present convictions upon this case.

On April 10, 1882, he writes to the President:

* * * As I have before said verbally and in writing, I take a very deep interest in this matter, because I deem myself somewhat responsible for the continuous punishment of an officer of high rank in the Army whose innocence I am now as sure of as it is possible for one to be in human evidence. * * *

May 29, 1882, he writes Senator CAMERON:

DEAR SENATOR: I understand the bill for the relief of General F. J. Porter will be called up to-morrow if there is a session, if not on the first meeting thereafter. I hope you will do all that is proper to expedite a hearing and vote in his case. My feeling in this matter is intensified by my thorough conviction of Porter's innocence of the charges upon which he was convicted and the fact that I am more or less responsible for the long delay in having justice—partial justice—done him. LOGAN made an able speech against Porter, believing him guilty, as I did at the time, but I do not believe he will benefit himself by renewing the attack, now that an investigation, not only by an able and impartial board, acting as judges and not as defenders, unqualifiedly pronounce him innocent, but writers of history, free from prejudice or prejudiced against him, also so find.

If you can urge a vote this week I will regard it as a special favor. The bill is a very mild one in comparison to what I think is due Porter; but perhaps it is better that it should be so.

December 27, 1882, in reply to a letter which referred to the bill then pending for his own restoration to the Army, General Grant says:

* * * * * * *

I care nothing about mine whatever. It will depend much upon the discussion that takes place in Congress whether I accept, even if it does pass. In yours I feel a much deeper interest, and am ready to say now, that if yours can be advanced by laying mine "on the table" or withdrawing it, I am ready to ask it.

On February 21, 1883, writing upon the same subject, General Grant says:

DEAR GENERAL: I have your letter of this a. m. I beg you to give yourself no concern about the bill for my retirement. I care nothing about it; in fact, should be governed in my acceptance or declination of its benefits—if it were to pass and receive the signature of the President—by the discussion in Congress and comments by the public. Of course, I should esteem it a great compliment if Congress, with great unanimity, should pass this bill, should pass the bill before the House, and it should be received with favor by the public. Otherwise I would not accept. But even if I were anxious for the passage of the bill retiring me, I would not have it at the expense of one so deeply wronged as I now know you have been.

November 23, 1883, General Grant writes a letter to General Porter in which he uses the following emphatic language:

* * * But I did believe that General Pope was so odious to some of the officers in the East that a cordial support was not given him by them. I was disposed, too, to accept the verdict of a court-martial composed as the one which tried you was. Some of the members of that court I knew personally, and had great confidence in their judgment and justice. I supposed you had shared in this feeling towards Pope, and while not more guilty than others, you were unfortunate in being placed in a position where specifications could be made showing this hostility.

After the close of the war, when I was requested to read your new defense, I read it with the feeling above described. At the same time I read the other side as prepared—or furnished—by General Pope. * * * I was first shaken in my views, however, when such a man as General Terry—who unites the lawyer with the soldier—a man of high character and ability, and who had believed as I had, and possibly worse, after many weeks of investigation, should entirely vindicate you and be sustained, too, by men of the known ability of his colleagues on the board.

* * * * * * *

I have no doubt now but the change would have taken place in 1867 if I had then made an investigation. I regret now that I did not understand your case then as I do now. Your whole life since your trial, as well as your services before, disprove the great burden of the charges then sustained by a court-martial. As long as I have a voice it shall be raised in your support without any reference to the effect upon me or others. Your restoration to the Army, simply, I would regard as a very inadequate and unjust reparation. While men—one at least—have been restored to the Army because of their gallantry and wounds, after conviction and sentence, and when there is no doubt of their guilt, are given all their pay for the years they were out of the service, I can see no reason for your having less.

I hope for you a through vindication, not only by Congress, but in the minds of your countrymen.

On July 4, 1884, but twenty-seven days after the development of Ward's perfidy, by which Grant was financially ruined, apparently forgetting his own troubles, he writes:

You can scarcely conceive the pain it caused me to read the veto of your bill by the President yesterday. I was not prepared for it. His message is the merest sophistry. It is no doubt a great disappointment to you and your family, but I believe it will result ultimately in doing you fuller justice.

You were dismissed unjustly and you are entitled to restoration. That would make you a major-general from the date of dismissal to the time of restoration. I want to see this final decision in your case.

Be of good cheer and pray that justice may yet be done you and yours.

Presidents Lincoln and Grant, Generals Schofield, Terry, and Getty

EXAMINED THE CASE INTELLECTUALLY,

were convinced of their error, and immediately sought to do Porter justice. All these great men were too exalted in character to be controlled by personal or political prejudice in a matter involving right, honor, and justice. The moment they found they had done General Porter injustice, without a thought as to the effect upon themselves, their every effort seemed to be to rectify the wrong they had committed. Look at the gallant and honest General Terry. No one in this House ever was more thoroughly convinced of Porter's guilt than he; yet when he learns the truth he asks Porter's pardon for remaining in ignorance of his case, confessing:

I might have learned something of the truth had I diligently sought it.

Look at General Grant. Once convinced he had done wrong, when he examined the case in 1866, by giving too much weight to the papers "prepared or furnished by General Pope" which caused him to refuse any action in Porter's behalf, this distinguished officer now, at any personal sacrifice, sought to aid Porter in attaining justice.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] does not seem to understand or is unable to comprehend General Grant's greatness of character, and he does him the injustice to charge that his vindication of Porter was caused by old age, of necessity creating the inference that his conclusions were the result of impaired intellect. Is it possible that this is the measure of gratitude Republicans have to General Grant in return for his service to their party and his country?

General Grant became convinced of his error in 1881, and his history shows that during the four years from that time to his death the vigor of his intellect was remarkable, and yet to disparage General Grant's opinion this gentleman would have us believe that during these years his mind was enfeebled by old age.

The man who during the illness which terminated his life wrote a history of the war which will be accepted as the standard authority upon that subject, and for which his honored widow has already received a quarter of a million dollars, I respectfully submit ought to have escaped this assault.

General Grant's friends will not thank the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] for the feeble words of praise with which he sugar-coats these unworthy insinuations against a great and honored hero.

If any gentleman opposed to this bill can rise in his seat and declare that he has brought to this subject the same amount of experience and has bestowed upon it the same degree of intelligent and careful study that General Grant gave it, and in spite of that study still considers Porter guilty, I feel confident Porter will be willing to withdraw his case from Congress. I call upon any gentleman who has given this subject the same consideration that General Grant has, and brought to it the same experience, to rise in his seat and say that he considers Porter guilty.

Mr. STEELE. I do not know how much consideration General Grant gave it, but I consider Porter guilty. I think I have given a great deal more attention to the subject than did General Grant, or he never would have found as he did.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman does not say that he has given it the same careful consideration that General Grant has——

Mr. CURTIN. Very much depends on the amount of ability and experience as a soldier which may be brought to the consideration of the case.

Mr. WHEELER. I have great respect for the talent and ability of my friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], but must confess some amazement at his statement, which implies an assumption that he knows more about the case than General Grant. I have also great respect for the other members of the minority of the committee, and if any one of them might deem himself justified in challenging a military opinion of General Grant we should expect it to be the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania.

We see running through General Grant's correspondence repeated reference to his feeling of responsibility on account of his failure to do Porter justice when it was in his power to have done so. He loses sight of himself, and his own restoration to the Army he regards as nothing when compared to the rectification of the wrongs inflicted upon Porter.

My failure to do what I now wish I had done, to place General Porter right before the public and in future history, and to repair my own unintentional injustice.

These are the words which come from General Grant's heart. Such was the feeling which actuated men like Lincoln, Grant, Schofield, Terry, and Getty.

They were all Republicans; not a Democrat among them.

Like guiding stars of night, like beacons seen by a storm-tossed mariner, the example set by these men might well be taken to aid in steering your party to a haven of right. These are men you might well follow, admire, and emulate.

St. Paul never considered the effect upon himself when he ceased to persecute and commenced to follow Christ. He did it because his heart told him it was right, and he labored for Christianity more abundantly than them all. Lincoln, Grant, Schofield, Terry, and Getty had for years "condemned General Porter, both in thought and sometimes in speech," but, actuated by the same grand principle of right, now labored abundantly to rectify the wrong they had unintentionally done.

The bright morning sun which on July 23, at Mount McGregor, cast its rays upon the bier of the greatest of these shines to-day upon us, the chosen Representatives of his beloved country. Can we not learn a lesson from the last acts of the dead hero, a man capable of rising above himself, a man to whom right was better than might and justice dearer than personal ambition.

THERE IS A BEAUTIFUL FANCY

of pagan mythology which insists that when men who were pre-eminent in any cause on earth meet in the happy fields of Elysium and discuss the events in which, while mortal, they had been the chief actors, they cheerfully and cordially concede the transcendent merits of each other in their several fields of endeavor. How adroitly and charmingly Jomini avails himself of this fiction as introductory to his Napoleon:

Long time had the Elysian Fields resounded with the memorable events which marked the beginning of the nineteenth century. The shades of Pitt, Thugut, Kleber, Moreau, Nelson, Lannes, and the many other heroes slain in battle had already carried there a thousand different versions of the combinations to which were attributed so many victories and so many defeats. The illustrious inhabitants of these mysterious regions were waiting with impatience the appearance of the extraordinary man who had been the principal actor in these events, and who alone could explain them.

Already the news of his exile to St. Helena, and of the barbarous treatment he received there, gives warning of his approaching end. Already homicidal fate seizes his scissors * * * inexorable Atropos cannot suffer so noble a victim to escape. Finally, on the 5th of May, 1821, the clear sky of Elysium is suddenly covered with clouds, the angry waves of Acheron, lashed by the unchained winds, give notice of some extraordinary apparition. All, with a common sentiment of interest and curiosity, hasten to the shore. Soon the skiff of the sad and silent Charon is seen approaching; it carries the shade of Napoleon the * * *. All press forward to see him; Alexander, Cæsar, Frederick, are in the first rank, and they alone have the right of interrogating him.

To the usual felicitations succeed the most weighty questions. Alexander, who from the mountains of Macedonia penetrated into India and returned victorious, is astonished at the retreat from Moscow, and asks to know the cause; Cæsar, who died invincible, asks an explanation of the disasters of Llepsic and Waterloo; Frederick, so great in reverses and so measured in his enterprises, wishes an explanation of the prompt destruction of his monarchy and of its brilliant resurrection in 1813.

Napoleon then recites the events which mark and at the close of the narration the verdict of the noble Areopagus was pronounced:

HIS EXTRAORDINARY CAREER,

His illustrious auditors declared with unanimous voice that, although he had failed in the execution of his vast projects, he surpassed them all in his force of genius and greatness of soul. Each in particular eulogized those traits which most resembled his own: Alexander praised Napoleon for his generosity to his conquered foes; Cæsar admired his having built up an empire out of the scattered fragments of public liberty, and established his power with legions destined to defend that liberty; Frederick applauded his spirit of order and economy, and was particularly pleased at seeing his own system of war receive such new and extensive developments.

From that moment the four heroes became inseparable, and their conversations form an inexhaustible source of political and military instruction, and constitute the principal charm and delight of the illustrious shades who inhabit the fields of Elysium.

Applying this pleasing fiction to the present case, what can we imagine will be Grant's salutation to Porter when they meet in the Elysian fields? Judging from the last expressions and efforts of the illustrious leader of the Union armies, have we not a right to say it will be: "Thank God, Porter, after your many years of martyrdom, the American people did you justice."

And to pursue the same delightful conceit, can we not fancy Porter, surrounded by Ney, Soult, Massena, Macdonald, Stonewall Jackson, and Hancock as they greet him with, "All hail to you, Porter! Your achievements at Malvern Hill and the Second Manassas surpass in glory anything of which we can boast."

No one blames General Pope for his misfortunes. The greatest and most successful soldiers have lost battles, have lost campaigns, have lost kingdoms, empires, and country. Misfortune was even more potent than their genius, and no one ever thought of reproaching them for being overcome by the irresistible. Frederick the Great, in the apparent hopelessness of his cause which followed the defeat of Rossbach, still retained the love and confidence of his people and commanded the admiration of the world; Kosciusko is immortal in fame and poetry though defeated in his military efforts and patriotic aspirations; Washington, after the reverses at Boston and Long Island, and amid all the gloom which lowered on the patriot cause in the

was still revered by his countrymen as a devoted patriot and trusted by his troops and people as a military commander; Lee, in his almost solitary ride from Appomattox to Richmond, had lost no jot or tittle of the glory and popular idolatry which had attached to his name in the midst of his greatest triumphs. And to use the language of Napier:

Napoleon, the greatest man of whom history makes mention, the most wonderful commander, the most sagacious politician, the most profound statesman, lost by arms Poland, Germany, Italy, Portugal, Spain, and France. Fortune, that name for the unknown combinations of infinite power, was wanting to him, and without her aid the designs of man are as bubbles on a troubled ocean.

The almost unanimous expressions of opinion by the press and people of the United States, without distinction of party, had led me to hope that this bill would at least escape the old and exploded objections urged against General Porter in former Congresses. In this hope, I regret to say, I have been disappointed.

The minority of the committee say:

There is another reason why we can not join in the report of the majority, and that is that we gravely doubt the propriety or constitutionality of Congress attempting to review and reverse the adjudication of a military judicial tribunal.

* * * * * * *

Courts-martial have been established by the law-making power for the administration of order, discipline, and justice in the land and naval forces of the United States.

It is beyond the province of Congress to review or reverse the decisions of these courts-martial. If they are not a part of the judicial system, they certainly belong to the executive department as appurtenant to the government of the Army, and in either case it would be an act of usurpation for Congress to set itself up as an appellate court-martial. * * *

If the court-martial erred, it is, in our opinion, one of those errors from which there is no appeal; one of the incidents inseparable from all judicial systems. This House might as properly attempt to review and correct the errors of the Supreme Court of the United States as to review and correct the errors of the highest military court, when its findings have been approved by the President of the United States and duly executed.

These are the grounds taken by President Arthur in his veto of the Fitz-John Porter bill passed by the Forty-eighth Congress. These objections are satisfactorily disposed of to the minds of all unprejudiced people by General Grant, who characterized the veto message as the "merest sophistry."

The fallacy of the position assumed by President Arthur and reasserted and adopted by the minority of the committee, with its underlying theory that all courts-martial are infallible, is strikingly illustrated by the fact that within the last ten years Congress has been compelled to examine into and reverse the decision of numerous courts-martial, some of which showed gross perversions of justice.

I do not wish to be understood as impugning or in any way assailing the integrity and fairness of courts-martial. This is by no means my purpose. On the contrary, I maintain and am prepared to defend and uphold the proposition that, as a rule, have been distinguished for their anxiety to arrive at a thorough and accurate knowledge of the facts which were to influence or govern their deliberations, and for the equal, exact, and impartial justice of their decisions. That there have been instances of deviation from this general rule or characteristic is doubtless true. But in the majority of cases the records will show that our military tribunals must be credited with fairness and impartiality.

THE COURTS OF OUR ARMY

And yet, partial as I am, by education and association, to the gentlemen engaged in the military service of our country, vigilant and eager as I am to defend them against and to repel unjust aspersions, I must unwillingly admit that there have been cases where the verdict of a court-martial appears to have been dictated by the personal feelings of its members rather than a desire to learn the truth and administer justice. This may sound like a harsh judgment, but it is warranted by facts. It is true, and a truth does not cease to be a truth because of concealment or strenuous denial.

These occasional miscarriages of military justice have not escaped the attention of our present pure and honored Executive, and in his last message they are alluded to in the vigorous language which I will now read:

If some of the proceedings of courts-martial which I have had occasion to examine present the ideas of justice which generally prevail in these tribunals, I am satisfied that they should be much reformed, if the honor and honesty of the Army and Navy are by their instrumentality to be vindicated and protected.

To say that we must accept as infallible the verdict of one of the tribunals which have provoked this unsparing censure is preposterous. And it is this very absurdity which President Arthur and the minority of the committee seem determined to maintain.

The difficulty with these champions of the inviolability of the verdict of this particular court-martial is this: They have somehow conceived the idea that the suit was a prosecution conducted solely in the interest of General John Pope, and they can not divest themselves of this error. If they were correct in these premises, I admit the justice of their conclusions. If the case had been General Pope against General Fitz-John Porter, and if, as some seem to contend, General Pope acquired a right or proprietary ownership in the judgment, then Congress would have no right to interfere. If General Pope were the then he, and he alone, could consent to its being annulled. But we may as well now inform him and his supporters that the record shows the case to have been the United States against Porter. The 33,000,000 of American people were the plaintiffs, and General Porter was the defendant. These 33,000,000 people, now increased to 60,000,000, find the judgment was obtained by mistaken evidence, perjury, and fraud, and that if the whole truth and nothing but the truth had been put in evidence and placed before the tribunal, the judgment of the court would have been in favor of Fitz-John Porter and against the plaintiffs. And these 33,000,000 people, increased to 60,000,000, now say, "We are too honorable to retain the benefit of a judgment to which, under the law and the facts, we are not entitled, and we come into open court and declare that, impelled by conscience, right, and justice, we hereby release our judgment and ask that it be annulled."

Every successful suitor in any court has a right to do that, and every honorable one will always do it. The United States of America in their sovereign capacity can not possess less right in such a matter than is possessed by one of their citizens, and certainly they ought not to be less honorable than individual citizens. Nay, they ought to be more honorable; they ought to set the example of honor and integrity.

I repeat that the entire theory of the opponents to this bill seems to rest upon the presumption of Pope's interest in this matter. That was certainly General Pope's idea. He was almost continually alluding to it as his case, or as one in which he had an interest.

I will read a paragraph from a letter written by him to General Grant in 1867:

HEADQUARTERS THIRD MILITARY DISTRICT,
Atlanta, Ga., September 16, 1867.

GENERAL: As I am one of the principal parties concerned in the case of Fitz-John Porter, and as I learn that he is in Washington city seeking a reopening of his case, on the ground that he has come into possession of testimony since the close of the war which has an important bearing on the subject, and as I suppose it is not unlikely that a commission may be ordered to examine that testimony and report upon it, I consider it my duty as well as my right respectfully to submit to your attention or that of any commission that may be ordered, the following remarks, for such consideration as they merit. * * *

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN POPE,
Bvt. Maj. Gen., U. S. A.

General U. S. GRANT, Washington, D. C.

This letter was a very long one and contained a reiteration of the numerous errors and misstatements which appeared in the arguments for the prosecution before the court-martial in 1862-'63, and we have the

that it was potential in its effect upon his mind, and led to the rejection of Porter's appeal to have his case reopened. In further corroboration of this view, I quote the following from General Pope's letter to Senator Wade:

In the last days of January, 1863, when the trial of Fitz-John Porter had closed and when his guilt had been established I intimated to the President that it seemed a proper time then for some public acknowledgment of my services in Virginia from him.

This would appear to indicate that General Pope was laboring under the delusion that he must benefit by the condemnation visited upon General Porter, and that any degradation of the latter must result in corresponding exaltation of himself.

I am surprised at the assertion of the minority:

This House might as properly attempt to review and correct the errors of the Supreme Court of the United States as to review and correct the errors of the highest military court, when its findings have been approved by the President of the United States and duly executed.

This attempt to establish an absolute parallel between the Supreme Court of the United States and a court-martial could hardly have been made had the minority given the subject that thoughtful attention which the gravity of the issue demanded. The Supreme Court was created by the Constitution, the same supreme authority to which Congress likewise owes its existence. The Supreme Court is a court of appellate jurisdiction in all cases except those affecting embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and cases in which a State is a party. Therefore with the rarest exceptions the function of this court is to examine into and decide upon the proceedings of inferior tribunals.

But I insist that even in a case where the Supreme Court had affirmed any decision of a lower court against a citizen and in favor of the United States Congress has the power and the right to annul the verdict.

Courts-martial are tribunals unknown to the Constitution. They owe their existence to the Articles of War, which by act of Congress were made laws of the United States. These Articles of War were taken almost verbatim from monarchical governments, under which courts-martial were little more than advisory bodies to military commanders.

The minority of the committee also hold that the feature of the bill authorizing the President to nominate and, by and with the advice of the Senate, to appoint Fitz-John Porter to the position of colonel in the Army is an invasion of the executive prerogative. On this point the report says:

Again, the power of nominating officers of the Army and Navy belongs under the Constitution exclusively to the President.

If this bill does not nominate F. J. Porter to the office of "colonel in the Army," then it is an absolute nullity and of no force whatever. If it does nominate him to that office, then it is an invasion of the executive prerogative, and is a usurpation.

Certainly the minority have failed to observe, or have chosen to ignore, the fact to which I have previously adverted, that within the last ten years the President has appointed a number of officers to the Army under and by virtue of acts of Congress reversing verdicts of courts-martial. Is it not singular that this peculiar theory is invoked for the first time in opposition to this particular bill, and is sought to be applied in bar of the claims of this particular individual?

Since the organization of the Government many

SIMILAR CASES HAVE ARISEN.

Prominent among them I recall that of the restoration to the Army of George B. Crittenden by act of Congress. But I do not wish to fatigue the House with a tiresome recapitulation, and therefore shall confine myself to acts of Congress of recent date, authorizing the restoration or appointment of officers to the Army, some of which I will recite.

An act to create an additional major of artillery, and to promote Capt. James M. Robertson.

Be it enacted, &c., That an additional major be added to the Second Regiment of Artillery, to be filled by the nomination and appointment of Capt. James M. Robertson, of said regiment, by the President of the United States, and that the said Robertson take rank next after the junior major of artillery: Provided, however, That the additional major added by this act to the Second Regiment of Artillery shall not hereafter be filled by any other officer, and the office shall expire whenever, by any casualty, the number of majors in each regiment of artillery shall be reduced to three.

SEC. 2. That the pay of said Captain Robertson as major shall commence from the date of his confirmation by the Senate on the nomination by the President.

An act for the relief of D. T. Kirby. (U. S. Stat. at Large, volume 22, page 97; May 26, 1882.)

On the 3d March, 1879, Congress passed the following act (20 Stat. at Large, 848):

Chapter 201.—An act for the relief of Joseph B. Collins.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to reinstate Maj. Joseph B. Collins, late of the United States Army, and to retire him in that grade, as of the date he was previously mustered out, charging him with all extra pay and allowances paid him at that time.

Under and in pursuance of this act the President, on the 8th March, 1879, issued the following order:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 8, 1879.

Under authority conferred by the act approved March 3, 1879, Joseph B. Collins is hereby reinstated in the Army of the United States as a major of infantry, and placed on the retired-list in that grade, to date January 1, 1871.

R. B. HAYES.

This case was brought before the Court of Claims in a proceeding instituted by the beneficiary of the act to recover his pay in accordance with its provisions. And this involved the consideration by the court of the validity of acts of this character. The case is reported as Collins vs. The United States. (14 Court of Claims Reports, page 570.)

Justice Richardson delivered the opinion, in which he said:

This the accounting officer of the Treasury refused to allow on the ground that he had not been reappointed with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Two questions arise which require careful consideration: First, whether by the terms of the act Congress intended to confer upon the President alone authority to reinstate the claimant; and, second, whether it had the constitutional power so to do.

It appears to have been the purpose of Congress to place upon the retired-list a veteran officer who, upon the reduction of the Army, had been ungenerously mustered out of service. It was not its object to increase the effective military force of the Army, but to place upon what may be regarded as an especially honorable pension-roll a single individual, who, after long service, had the misfortune to be summarily dismissed without any fault of his own.

The Court of Claims then considered the constitutional provisions as to appointments, and decided in favor of Major Collins, fully affirming the right of Congress to pass such acts, the language of the court (volume 14, page 576), which I will read, being:

It is therefore clear on principle and authority that his appointment was legal and constitutional, and that he is entitled to the pay and emoluments of the office which he claims.

The fact that the President has sometimes availed himself of the authority granted by these laws to make the appointments referred to, and in other cases has declined to do so, is a complete answer to the idea advanced by the minority that laws of this character are in any manner imperative upon the Executive.

It follows, therefore, that if the practice of Congress or the decisions of a court are to have weight these objections of the minority must fall.

I entertain some doubts as to the propriety of dignifying General Pope's article in the Century by even referring to it, much less undertaking the simple task of its formal refutation. It is a of the misstatements which General Grant said had deceived him when he investigated the case in 1867. I shall say nothing regarding the bad taste of such a publication appearing on the first day of the very month in which the bill was to be considered in Congress; but it contains some errors or misrepresentations that are so glaring that it becomes a duty to expose them. He says in the Century:

On the 27th of June I assumed command of the army of Virginia, which consisted of three corps. Frémont's corps, 11,500; Banks's corps, 8,000, and McDowell's corps, 18,500; in all, 38,000 men.

In the War Records we find the official report of the aggregate strength of this army, present for duty, at the same date to be 63,718, and, as I will show, it was re-enforced sufficiently to give General Pope a force actually available for the defense of Washington, prior to the engagements which culminated in the second battle of Manassas, which certainly approximated 157,544 men.

General Pope's return, dated July 31, 1862 (War Records, volume 12, part 3, page 523), showed his force to be 71,974. But he claims that, owing to detachments, the corps of Sigel, Banks, and McDowell had on the banks of the Rappahannock but 52,000 men present for duty, from which there must be deducted the 1,400 men lost at Cedar Run.

Assuming this to be correct, the strength of these three corps present for duty was	50,600
Add cavalry not included in other returns (volume 12 part 2, page 53)	6,835
Add Reynolds's division (volume 12, part 2, page 396)	4,723

From these figures we learn that General Pope had in the latter part of August, available for the defense of Washington, a total force of	157,544

General Pope also says in the Century:

The corps of General F. J. Porter consisted of ten thousand men, and was by far the finest if not the best in the Army. He had made very short and deliberate marches from Fredericksburg, and his advance division, mainly troops of the regular Army, under Sykes, had arrived at Warrenton Junction by 11 o'clock on the morning of the 27th, Morell's division of the same corps arriving later in the same day.

The reverse of this is the truth. The Fifth Corps (General Fitz-John Porter's) marched from Harrison's Landing at 7 p. m. August 14, and although, as General Halleck states in his letter of August 26, the movement "was greatly he and his troops were engaged night and day, marching, embarking, and disembarking, and on ships packed like herrings. On the night of August 27 it reached Warrenton Junction, after a very hot march of from 12 to 18 miles, without food or water. In this connection I quote from the paper of General Weld, a gallant officer of Porter's corps, read before the Massachusetts Historical Society in Boston April 16, 1877:

His [Porter's] previous record was so honorable and so well known, that even his accusers did not venture to attack it. The extraordinary energy and zeal displayed by him in marching from Harrison's Landing to Newport News and in embarking and hastening his troops to Acquia Creek and forwarding them from there to Pope, are admitted even by Judge Advocate Holt. No complaint or fault is found with him until the day after joining Pope, which he did on the 27th of August. His marches had been rapid his vigilance unceasing, his obedience to all orders unquestioned, and, in a word, his conduct in all military matters had been that of a skillful, practiced soldier and of one who deserved well of he Republic.

General Pope also says in the Century:

At dark on the 27th, Hooker informed me that his ammunition was nearly exhausted. * * * In consequence of Hooker's report and the weakness of the small division which he commanded, and to strengthen my right wing moving in the direction of Manassas, I sent orders to Porter at dark, which reached him at 9 o'clock p. m., to move forward from Warrenton Junction at 1 o'clock that night, and to report to me at Bristoe Station by daylight next morning (August 28). * * * It was possible, however (for Jackson), to mass his whole force at Manassas Junction and assail our right (Hooker's division), which had fought a severe battle that afternoon, and was almost out of ammunition. Jackson, with A. P. Hill's division, retired through Centreville. Thinking it altogether within the probabilities that he might adopt the other alternative (mass his whole force at Manassas Junction), I sent the orders above mentioned to General Porter. He neither obeyed them nor attempted to obey them, but afterward gave as a reason for not doing so that his men were tired, the night was too dark to march, and that there was a wagon-train on the road toward Bristoe.

EVERY ESSENTIAL STATEMENT

in this extract from the Century article is so manifestly an afterthought that General Pope must have been reduced to the hardihood of desperation before he could venture to put them forward seriously. It is established beyond the possibility of controversy that he had no knowledge of Hooker being short of ammunition until long after he had dispatched the order to Porter. It is worthy of notice just here, that at 9.30 p. m., two and a half hours after the date of the order to Porter, General Pope sent orders to McDowell and Reno to march to Manassas Junction, and to Kearny to march to Bristoe Station, and in none of these orders did he refer to Hooker being short of ammunition, although in two of them he dwelt specially on Hooker having had a severe fight.

At 6.05 a. m. on the 28th General Pope wrote to General Porter:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Bristoe Station, August 28, 1862—6.05 a. m.

Maj. Gen. F. J. PORTER,
Commanding Fifth Corps:

GENERAL: Major-General Pope directs me to say that General Hooker reports his ammunition exhausted. * * *

This is the first allusion we can find to this subject in General Pope's correspondence, and when taken in connection with other facts it is fair to presume that it was about this time that he first learned of Hooker's want of ammunition. This shows that it could not have been one of the reasons for his order to Porter, which was written twelve hours before.

So much for the first portion of the extract.

As to the second, I can only say that no one has ever attributed to General Pope such a lack of ordinary intelligence as is involved in its statement.

Surprising and astonishing as it may appear, I stand here to-day as the champion of John Pope the general, to defend him against the imputations and disparagement of John Pope the pamphleteer. John Pope the pamphleteer may, possibly, have imagined that so skillful and sagacious a soldier as Stonewall Jackson could have been guilty of the folly, after having succeeded in all that could be accomplished at Manassas Junction, and having established himself in comparative proximity to his supporting column under Longstreet, of deliberately and voluntarily placing Pope's army between himself and his support; of his own choice isolating his command, and in its exposed condition inviting its destruction by an onslaught of the combined forces of his opponent. Against John Pope the pamphleteer I oppose John Pope the general, as he appears in the official records, from which we learn that John Pope the general, up to 9 o'clock p. m. of August 27, had never exhibited such a lack of judgment and perception as John Pope the pamphleteer now attributes to him. At 6.30 p. m. August 27 John Pope the general, in an order to General Porter, said:

The enemy has been driven back, but is retiring along the railroad. We must drive him from Manassas, and clear the country between that place and Gainesville, where McDowell is.

At 9 o'clock p. m. of the same day, in an order to McDowell, he said:

If you will move promptly and rapidly at the earliest dawn of day upon Manassas Junction we shall bag the whole crowd.

In a simultaneous order to Kearny we find the same idea in the words:

I want you here at day-dawn, if possible, and we shall bag the whole crowd.

And at the same time Reno is admonished:

If you are prompt and energetic [in moving on Manassas Junction] we shall bag the whole crowd.

It will be noticed that in none of these orders does John Pope the general, intimate that he entertains the idea that Jackson is to be caught at Manassas Junction, as John Pope the pamphleteer would have us believe he did, but that the conception, perception, and intention of John Pope the general, as indicated in his orders, was only to pursue a flying enemy and capture (bag) him somewhere before he reached Thoroughfare Gap as he "retired along the railroad."

John Pope the pamphleteer says:

The distance [from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station] was 9 miles along the railroad track, with a wagon-road on each side of it most of the way.

The error in stating the distance at 9 instead of 10 miles is not important, but it is well known to all soldiers of either army who served in the locality referred to that the road was single and was crossed by the railroad several times in its tortuous course; nor is there any excuse for General Pope's statement in the January Century that—

The railroad track itself was clear and entirely practicable for the march of infantry.

We have shown that the proof was positive that trains were passing back and forth until 4 o'clock on the morning of the 28th.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. VIELE. I will yield to my colleague on the committee [Mr. WHEELER] ten minutes of the time to which I shall be entitled hereafter.

Mr. BRUMM. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will prove what he said he would in reply to my question—outside, of course, of Porter's own evidence.

Mr. WHEELER. I have proved it by Pope; that is enough.

Mr. BRUMM. You have not done it as yet.

Mr. WHEELER. Oh, yes, I have; you did not listen. I read the evidence.

Mr. BRUMM. From the record?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; from the record.

Mr. BRUMM. Well, I shall ask after a while to look at it.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire in closing to say that the attitude of men from the South on this subject has been one I have heard commented on. I think that I know the feelings which control their action in this case, and I am sure they will pardon an attempt on my part to give them expression. I beg you will not misunderstand the attitude of who vote for this bill; do not misinterpret our interest in this case. The necessity for our action would not exist were it not that some of the opponents to the bill still appeal to a character of party passion which has long since been repudiated by Republicans who are most esteemed by their political adherents. I regret and deplore the efforts to degrade a judicial question to a party conflict, but we are free from the responsibility of the position these gentlemen have voluntarily assumed, and no taunts from mistaken zealots can drive us from a plain and unquestioned duty.

We advocate and support this bill because we see in it the only means to repair a cruel wrong; to atone for gross, though perhaps unintentional, injustice; to relieve a gallant soldier and honorable gentleman from a grievous martyrdom, long and nobly endured. As soldiers, we are bound to spare no effort to relieve this brave commander from unmerited disgrace; as men, we feel called upon to do all in our power to succor the weak and suffering; as gentlemen, we are obliged to do frankly and fearlessly what we conceive to be honorable and right; as servants of the people, we must strive to secure this tardy justice to one who so ably served them; and as citizens of this great Republic, it is our duty and our pride to cherish and defend its honor, and we therefore seek to efface this blot upon the fair fame of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. CUTCHEON obtained the floor.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SPRINGER). The gentleman from Alabama has occupied only five minutes of the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VIELE].

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with my remarks, I desire to say that the material I have before me is much greater than I can compress into the time allowed me; and for that reason I shall ask the courtesy and indulgence of my colleagues on the committee and other members of the House to permit me to pursue my argument without interruption until I have finished it; then, if any time should remain to me, or if any gentleman will yield me further time, I will gladly answer such questions as may be put to me, to the best of my ability.

I will state, Mr. Chairman, that the honorable gentlemen from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], my colleague on the committee, has yielded me the remainder of his time, thirty-five minutes, which I desire first to occupy. He is now out of his seat, though he was here a moment ago; but that is the arrangement; so that I desire to proceed without break at the end of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, or perhaps I should say "if the court please," the supreme court-martial of the United States is now in session. We are engaged in rewriting history. It may be said that history, if wrong, should be rewritten. Let it be granted. But it should be rewritten at a time, upon evidence, and under circumstances that will be likely to assure greater and not less correctness.

Almost a quarter of a century has elapsed since the facts in this case were judicially investigated. The dust of years has gathered in the chambers of memory; boys have become men, men of middle age have become old, and many of them have passed on since then to—

> The undiscover'd country, from whose bourn
> No traveler returns.

Most of the conspicuous figures of that period who were connected with the events which led to Fitz-John Porter's conviction and dismissal have passed away. Halleck, who convened the court; Hunter, who presided; Garfield, who gave to the evidence his clear, strong, logical mind, and Lincoln, who approved the finding and sentence of the court, have all gone over to the majority. McDowell and McClellan, Hooker and Heintzelman, Burnside and Birney, Kearny and Reno and Grover, and hundreds of others, are no longer here to correct errors of fact or false constructions of evidence. At this distance of time and in this absence of witnesses we ought to proceed with the greatest caution in reversing their work.

General Fitz-John Porter, a colonel in the regular Army and major-general of volunteers, was, during the months of November and December, 1862, and January, 1863, fully, fairly, and patiently tried by a general court-martial, and, after every possible opportunity for defense, was convicted of disobedience of three several important and explicit orders from his commanding general, also of three separate specifications of misbehavior in the presence of the enemy, and was sentenced to be dishonorably dismissed from the service and disqualified for holding any office of profit or trust under the United States. The sentence was approved and executed. The latter part of the sentence has been removed by the exercise of the pardoning power. This bill is a legislative declaration of innocence.

I have no personal feeling in this cause, and no political bias, except in so far as the great names of Stanton, Garfield, and Lincoln would make me cautious to cast no shadow upon their probity or their integrity. This is a bill to set aside the finding and sentence of the highest court-martial ever assembled in this country, regularly constituted, convened by competent authority, bound by the sanction of a solemn oath, hearing and seeing the living witnesses, and assisted by the ablest counsel for the accused. The proceedings were reviewed by the able Judge-Advocate-General, approved and confirmed by the President, and carried duly into execution. Such a sentence, so approved, so executed, is beyond appeal. It is res adjudicata for all time. The President can not revoke it; the Supreme Court can not set it aside. He must be legislated into a pardon by the law-making power.

The very statement of the proposition would seem to be sufficient to show its impropriety. Not only that, he is to be rewarded, to be put back at the head of the list of colonels with rank the same as if he had not been dismissed.

It is at least an open question whether this bill as it stands will not also give him pay from the day of his dismissal. The bill provides—

> That said Fitz-John Porter shall receive no pay, compensation, or allowance whatsoever prior to his appointment under this act.

That is to say he shall not receive the compensation prior to his appointment, but it does not say that after his appointment he shall not receive full compensation covering the period prior to his appointment. If this proviso is intended in good faith to exclude compensation covering the time prior to his appointment it should say so in unambiguous langnage.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill—

First. Because I do not believe that Congress has constitutional power to reverse the finding of a general court-martial when it has been confirmed by the President of the United States and carried into execution by his order. The reasons for deciding that neither the President nor Congress can annul or set aside the final judicial judgment of a court-martial are given by Attorney-General Brewster in opinions of March 15, 1882, and June 23, 1884, from which last opinion are quoted extracts as follows:

> A court-martial is to be respected in its judgments the same as any other court. Its findings, when rendered and approved according to the due forms of that law which creates it, are to be treated as would be the final judgments of a court of final jurisdiction in the law. * * * Such a judgment the President has no power to review and annul or set aside.

Second. I do not believe that this House is qualified or fitted to review the finding of a judicial tribunal. It has none of the attributes of a court. It has none of the temper of a court. It has none of the sanctions of a court. It has none of the instrumentalities of a court. If courts-martial are a part of the judicial system, then this proposed action is usurpation of judicial powers. If they belong to the executive department as appurtenant to the Government and discipline of the Army, then it is usurpation of executive powers. In either case it is usurpation.

It is suggested that the United States, represented in Congress, has full power to remit a judgment in its favor. If it were a matter of civil damage, that perhaps would be true. But this is something more. It involves the reversal of a final verdict, involving only a question of guilt or innocence, and upon that I submit that none but a tribunal equipped to investigate that question can pass. It is not within the scope of legislative action.

Third. I am opposed to this bill because it is an invasion of the appointing power vested by the Constitution solely in the President.

If the President would be under obligation to regard the provisions of this bill, should it become law, then it would be tantamount to a legislative appointment—a violation of both the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

If he would not be bound to regard it as law, then it would be advice only—both an impertinence and a nullity.

If this can be done in one instance it can be done in all, and all the Legislature has to do is by act of Congress to abolish all offices, and then by another act create them, directing how they shall be filled, leaving to the Executive only the choice whether they shall remain vacant or be filled as dictated. We are therefore reduced to this dilemma: The bill in question is either advice or law. If it is advice, it is useless and without force; if it is law, it is usurpation of the executive prerogative. In either case it is inadvisable.

It is of no consequence that the present incumbent is willing to waive his prerogative, and to accept Congressional advice. The office is greater than the officer, and we have no right to degrade the former because the latter does not insist upon his rights.

Let us suppose for a moment that this House were in political accord with the Senate, and the Senate should to-morrow pass a bill increasing the number of Supreme Court judges to thirteen, and should designate four well-known Republican jurists to fill the four additional seats, so as to secure the political balance of that court for a long term of years, will it be contended that such an act would not be a trespass upon the prerogative of the Executive? But it would be no more so in principle than is this bill.

Fourth. I am opposed to the passage of this bill because I am profoundly convinced that the court-martial arrived at a just conclusion, under circumstances when both sides of the case were fully represented, at the only time when they were so represented; that their verdict was righteous and their sentence merciful.

It must be remembered that Fitz-John Porter does not stand before us with the presumption of innocence in his favor, as would be the case of a person standing before a jury at nisi prius. It is res adjudicata. He comes with the verdict of a competent court against him, and the presumption is in favor of the rightfulness of the decision of the court, and not in favor of the innocence of the accused. This is a point that seems to have been steadily overlooked in the argument on this question.

Before proceeding further with this branch of the subject I will give a hurried history of the military situation at that time. After the seven days' fighting around Richmond, General McClellan had changed the base of his operations from the Chickahominy to the James River, resting his right at Harrison's Landing on the river. General Pope had just been summoned from the West, where he had signalized his skill with marked success as a military man and soldier on several important occasions, and was intrusted with the command of an army then being formed from the corps of Generals Fremont, Banks, and McDowell, to be known as "the Army of Virginia" and consist of some thirty-odd thousand men. The purpose of this organization was, in the first place, to cover the approaches to Washington, and, secondly, to demonstrate in favor of McClellan in the direction of Richmond. General Pope assumed command of this consolidated force in the latter days of June, 1862, and his first step was to unite the force under him and move forward, with his right at Sperryville, while McDowell's corps was moved forward to Waterloo Bridge, the whole force being along the line and in front of the Rappahannock.

Now from this time on, the whole purpose of the Government at Washington was to consolidate the Army of the Potomac with the Army of Virginia. How should it be done? To withdraw Pope from his position on the Rappahannock in order to form a junction with the army operating on the James River was impossible, because it would have left the national capital uncovered. McClellan was then calling for re-enforcements, his first call being for one hundred thousand men, which was subsequently modified by a call for fifty thousand; but as his ultimatum, he said, he could not advance on Richmond with less than thirty-five thousand men. The Secretary of War looked over the entire field endeavoring to find from what point he could gather these re-enforcements to send McClellan, and finally it was determined that there was no other resource than to unite the two armies, that of the Potomac and of the Army of Virginia, in front of Washington and upon the line of the Rappahannock.

Upon the 3d of August, 1862, McClellan was directed to withdraw immediately the Army of the Potomac from its position on the James and interpose it between Washington and Richmond. This movement began on the 18th of August. Porter's corps, or one of his divisions, I believe, was the first to embark, and Heintzelman's, Reno's, and one or two other divisions were transferred from the James to the Army of Virginia prior to the operations about to be referred to.

Halleck, who was then the General-in-Chief of all the armies, directed General Pope to cling to the line of the Rappahannock. He telegraphed him again and again, "If you can but hold on until the 25th we shall re-enforce you all you need." Again he telegraphed on the 26th to Pope ordering him "to hold every inch of ground and fight like the devil." And, Mr. Chairman, Pope did fight like the devil, for he was always ready for a fight. So Pope with his army held his position on the line of the Rappahannock, with his left at the fords above Fredericksburg, where he was joined by Porter's divisions. This was the situation on the night of the 26th, when Pope ordered Porter's command to join him the next day.

Up to this time he had been under the direct command of the General-in-Chief. On the morning of the 27th General Porter with his command arrived at Warrenton Junction and reported to Pope; but meanwhile, on the 13th of August, General Lee cut himself loose from Richmond, leaving it with only one army corps, or rather one division, that of D. H. Hill, and leaving it for McClellan to work his will with as he would, or dared, swung out into Virginia, concentrating his force at Gordonsville, with Jackson in advance and Longstreet following Jackson, and by the 18th of August the whole confederate army was reunited opposite the Federal army on the Rappahanock with the design of crushing the small army opposed to him before a junction of the Union armies could be effected, and then pushing on to Washington.

A fortunate rise in the river prevented him from making his contemplated movement upon Pope to crush him before the troops from the Army of the Potomac could reach him. But the rise in the river which saved Pope, temporarily separated one division of Lee's army from his command. At the suggestion of Jackson upon the 25th, Jackson was to make his contemplated move around the right of the Federal Army by way of Jefferson to Salem and Rectortown to Gainesville, plunge down through the gap on Pope's right and rear, cut his line of communications, capture his supplies, and get between him and the national capital.

With some reluctance, as I understand, General Lee assented to this arrangement. On the 25th Jackson marched from Jefferson to Salem. On the next day, the 26th, he struck out from Salem by way of White Plains and by Thoroughfare Gap to Gainesville, through Gainesville to Catlett's and Bristoe. A little after dark, having marched 30 miles without rest, he struck Pope's communications in rear and captured two trains of cars. And before midnight Stuart and Trimble were at Manassas Junction, 36 miles and more from where they had started in the morning. That shows what generals can do when they are in earnest. That was what the men we regarded as on the wrong side and supporting a bad cause could accomplish when they were commanded by a general who was determined to accomplish the purpose he had in view.

Jackson struck the railroad on the night of the 26th in the neighborhood of Kettle Run, a little tributary of Broad Run, which comes down between Bristoe and Catlett's Station. Pope found his telegraph communications cut and thought it was Jeb Stuart raiding in his rear. He put some regiments on flat cars and ran them down there, to find General Ewell with an entire division. Immediately old fighting Joe Hooker with his division was sent down; and on the afternoon of the 27th the battle raged, until three hundred of Hooker's men lay dead or wounded on the field.

Where at this time was Porter? He had just reported to General Pope that forenoon at Warrenton Junction. The first order that cuts any figure in this case is the order of the evening of the 27th, 6.30 p. m. It has been claimed that this order was an entirely unimportant, immaterial order. Now, let us see as to that. As the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] has very properly said, orders are always given with a purpose.

General Pope and his subordinate officers met that evening and talked over the situation, and orders for the operations of next morning were issued. What was the situation? Jackson was upon the railroad between Bristoe and Manassas and at Manassas; McDowell and Reno and Sigel were west of Gainesville, between Jackson and Thoroughfare Gap, the only road by which Longstreet could come to his succor. Porter was at Warrenton Junction, 9 miles from Hooker's battlefield. Hooker was at Bristoe late in the evening.

Now, what was the purpose of the orders for the next day? To concentrate Pope's army on the two sides of Jackson, one half on the north and west, the other on the south and west, and to pen Jackson between these two armies, McDowell, Reno, and Sigel coming from the direction of Gainesville, and Porter, Kearny, and Hooker coming from the west, with Banks in their rear. With this purpose Pope issued his orders. The first order to Fitz-John Porter is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Bristoe Station, August 27, 1862—6.30 p. m.

Maj. Gen. F. J. PORTER, Warrenton Junction:

GENERAL: The major-general commanding directs that you start at 1 o'clock to-night and come forward with your whole corps, or such part of it as is with you, so as to be here by daylight to-morrow morning. Hooker has had a very severe action with the enemy, with a loss of about three hundred killed and wounded. The enemy has been driven back, but is retiring along the railroad. We must drive him from Manassas, and clear the country between that place and Gainesville, where McDowell is. If Morell has not joined you, send him word to push forward immediately; also send word to Banks to hurry forward with all speed to take your place at Warrenton Junction. It is necessary on all accounts that you should be here by daylight. I send an officer with this dispatch who will conduct you to this place. Be sure to send word to Banks, who is on the road from Fayetteville, probably in the direction of Bealeton. Say to Banks, also, that he had best run back the railroad trains to this side of Cedar Run. If he is not with you, write him to that effect.

By command of General Pope:

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

What was he wanted for? Stonewall Jackson, one of the most brilliant generals this century has produced since Napoleon, was in Pope's rear, and had been fighting Hooker's division, which that evening had lost three hundred men killed and wounded. The battle was to be renewed in the morning, and as Heintzelman swears, he had informed Pope before dark that Hooker's division was out of ammunition—that there were not more than five rounds to each man—there was an emergency. Stonewall Jackson was between the upper and nether millstones. He could not retreat westward, because McDowell, Reno, and Sigel were on that side; nor in the direction of Warrenton Junction, because Porter, Hooker, Kearny, and Banks were there. Which way was he to go? Pope figured out the situation, and thought the only way Jackson could escape was to turn his right and move to the south of the Orange and Alexandria Railroad. The object of Pope was to concentrate these three army corps upon him at daylight before he could get away. Here is the order to General Kearny, dated at 9 p. m.:

HEADQUARTERS, BRISTOE, August 27, 1862—9 p. m.

Major-General KEARNY:

At the earliest blush of dawn push forward with your command with all speed to this place. You can not be more than 3 or 4 miles distant. Jackson, A. P. Hill, and Ewell are in front of us. Hooker has had a severe fight with them to-day. McDowell marches upon Manassas Junction from Gainesville to-morrow at daybreak; Reno upon the same place at the same hour. I want you here at day-dawn, if possible, and we shall bag the whole crowd. Be prompt and expeditous, and never mind wagon trains or roads till this affair is over. Lieutenant Brooks will deliver you this communication. He has one for General Reno and one for General McDowell. Please have these dispatches sent forward instantly by a trusty staff officer, who will be sure to deliver them without fail, and make him bring back a receipt to you before daylight. Lieutenant Brooks will remain with you and bring you to this camp. Use the cavalry I send you to escort your staff officer to McDowell and Reno.

JNO. POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

Not only that, but at 9 p. m., this to Major-General McDowell:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Bristoe Station, August 27, 1862—9 p. m.

Major-General MCDOWELL:

At daylight to-morrow morning march rapidly on Manassas Junction with your whole force, resting your right on the Manassas Gap Railroad, throwing your left well to the east. Jackson, Ewell, and A. P. Hill are between Gainesville and Manassas Junction. We had a severe fight with them to-day, driving them back several miles along the railroad. If you will march promptly and rapidly at the earliest dawn of day upon Manassas Junction we shall bag the whole crowd. I have directed Reno to march from Greenwich at the same hour upon Manassas Junction, and Kearny, who is in his rear, to march on Bristoe at daybreak. Be expeditious, and the day is our own.

JNO. POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

Here was a strategic combination, three army corps concentrating upon a single point, to surround Jackson at daylight before he could get away, and the whole key of the situation was in the hands of Fitz-John Porter at Warrenton Junction. Therefore General Pope gave him this order:

Major-General PORTER:

Start at 1 o'clock to-night, and come forward with your whole corps, or with so much as is with you, so as to be here at daylight to-morrow morning. It is of the last importance that you should be here at daylight.

That was the tenor of the dispatch. General Pope knew that everything depended upon absolute promptness. Warrenton Junction is 9 miles from Bristoe Station. The intervening space is a broad, open, pine plain—Manassas plain. I see gentlemen sitting around me who have marched over it again and again, and who know its character. It was an open pine plain, with no fences or obstructions of any kind, with the exception of one or two small streams; and roads everywhere. What did Porter do? He received this imperative order to start at 1 o'clock. General Sykes and General Morell, his division commanders, and General Butterfield, one of his brigade commanders, were in the tent with him. Holding the dispatch in his hand, he said, "Gentlemen, there is something for you to sleep on." They stepped out of the lighted tent into the starlight. The night appeared to be dark, and somebody said that it would not be possible to march at 1 o'clock. Then, after a little conversation, in which General Sykes swears positively the tenor of the order was never mentioned—nothing except that it was an order to march at 1 o'clock, nothing about the imperative terms of the order—Porter said, "Very well, we will march at 3 o'clock." Now the evidence is that they did not march at 3 o'clock. The reveille was sounded at 3 o'clock, but it was broad daylight, and the sun was up, before they were well upon the road. It was half past 10 before they reached Bristoe Station; it was half past 2 in the afternoon, as testified by one of the brigade commanders, before their rear reached Bistoe, and of course by that time Jackson was far away.

What are the excuses offered for Porter's disobedience of this order? First, that the night was dark and that he could not march. Yet that very night, and at that very hour, Stonewall Jackson, having burned our supplies at Manassas, marched two of his divisions to Centreville and a third, Taliaferro's, marched by the Sudley road to the old Bull Run battle-ground, nearly 9 miles, and bivouacked next morning at Sudley Ford. In fact, the whole rebel army marched that night. The same night McDowell was on the march; part of Reno's division was on the march. I believe every division of the Union Army, except Porter's, was on the march during some part of that night. But Porter could not march! Worse than that, he never attempted to march. Why, if the night was dark so that his progress would be impeded, what ought he to have done? The point of the order given him by General Pope was that he should be at Bristoe Station at daylight. Therefore, if the night was dark, instead of starting later than the hour indicated in the order, he should have started earlier. He should have said, "Gentlemen, we are to be at Bristoe Station at daylight. I do not know what it means, but there must be some emergency, or the commanding general would not have given this order; so you had better get ready to start right away, because the night is dark, and if there should be wagons on the road it will take us longer than if the circumstances were favorable."

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman forgets that a big thunder-shower was manufactured in this House two years ago as an additional excuse for Porter's failure to obey that order. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. We will let that thunder-shower pass over for the present. I will go on in spite of the rain.

Mr. HOPKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] whether that thunder-storm was ever heard of before it appeared in this House two years ago?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I believe not. I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN] is right about that; that was home-made thunder.

The next excuse is that Porter's troops were fatigued with their day's march. They were the freshest troops in the Army. Sykes's division had been in camp since the forenoon, and Morell's division had mostly arrived before sundown. But even if they had been tired, even tired troops must march in an emergency. The third excuse is that there were wagons on the road. The officer who brought the order swears that he passed the last wagon at Catlett's Station, and as the wagons were going in the same direction, he would not have encountered them before daylight. The excuse is a paltry one. It is one that no soldier who was in earnest ought to have made. If wagons were in the road he should have put them out of the road. Porter was found guilty of disobedience of the order to march at 1 o'clock.

EVENTS OF AUGUST 29.

On the morning of the 29th, at 3 a. m., General Pope sends this order:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Near Bull Run, August 29, 1862—3 a. m.

GENERAL: McDowell has intercepted the retreat of Jackson. Sigel is immediately on the right of McDowell. Kearny and Hooker march to attack the enemy's rear at early dawn. Major-General Pope directs you to move upon Centreville at the first dawn of day with your whole command, leaving your trains to follow. It is very important that you should be here at a very early hour in the morning. A severe engagement is likely to take place, and your presence is necessary.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Major-General PORTER.

The purpose of the campaign of the 29th was to hem Jackson in between Gainesville and Centreville before Longstreet should arrive. Heintzelman and Reno ordered forward in pursuit; Reynolds and Sigel on the south to attack at dawn; Porter ordered to close the gap on the west.

"A severe engagement is likely to take place," General Pope says. Did Porter obey that order, as a good soldier should; and if not, why not? I will answer that question. By the testimony it appears that that order reached Porter between daylight and sunrise. It was daylight at 4 in the morning, and the sun rose at 5.26. That order reached Porter between daylight and sunrise, yet at 7 o'clock he was still in his quarters back in front of Bristoe Station. At 6 o'clock that morning he was writing a dispatch, which I will presently read.

I may as well here as anywhere allude to

PORTER'S ANIMUS TOWARD POPE.

When he was ordered to join Pope he telegraphed on August 26 to General Burnside, telling him of his movements, and added, "Inform McClellan, that I may know that I am doing right." He wanted to know whether he was doing right in obeying an order from his superior officer to report to his commanding general! He had been ordered to join General Pope, yet he wanted McClellan to tell him whether he was doing right or not!

Immediately after joining Pope at Warrenton Junction, on the 27th of August, Porter telegraphed to General Burnside as follows:

* * * Everything here is at sixes and sevens, and I find I am to take care of myself in every respect. Our line of communication has taken care of itself in compliance with orders. * * * No guard accompanying trains and small ones guard bridges.

Again, on the same afternoon, before receiving the order to march to Bristoe, he telegraphed to Burnside:

AUGUST 27, 1862—4 p. m.

GENERAL BURNSIDE: * * * "I hear that they [Pope's troops] are much demoralized and needed some good troops to give them heart, and, I think, head. We are working now to get behind Bull Run, and I presume will be there in a few days, if strategy don't use us up. The strategy is magnificent, and the tactics in inverse ratio." * * * I do not doubt the enemy have a large amount of supplies provided for them, and I believe they have a contempt for the Army of Virginia. I wish myself away from it, with all our old Army of the Potomac, and so do our companions."

The next morning after his leisurely arrival at Bristoe Station, he telegraphs:

All that talk about taking Jackson, &c., was bosh. * * * The story of McDowell having cut off Longstreet was without foundation. I expect the next thing will be a raid on our rear by Longstreet, who was "cut off."

On the morning of the 29th, at about 3 a. m., Porter was ordered to move on Centreville "at the first dawn of day." The sun rose that morning at 5.26. At 6 o'clock, as I have said, Porter was still in his quarters, engaged in writing the following loyal dispatch to General Burnside:

BRISTOE, 29—6 a. m.

To General BURNSIDE:

* * * * * * *

Heintzelman and Reno are at Centreville, where they marched yesterday, and Pope went to Centreville with the last two as a body-guard, at the time not knowing where was the enemy, and when Sigel was fighting within 8 miles of him and within sight. Comment is unnecessary. * * * I hope Mac. is working and will soon get us out of this. (Volume 1, page 377.)

I have been assured by a gentleman, a resident of this city, then commanding a regiment of Kearny's division, that General Birney, then commanding a brigade of Kearny's division, heard Porter say on the morning of the 28th that "he would not put his corps into battle to be slaughtered for such d—d fool as John Pope."

Again, on August 29, Porter, in reply to an inquiry from Col. T. C. H. Smith, ordnance officer, whether he had received his ammunition, said that it was "going where it belonged;" that it was "on the road to Alexandria, where we are all going." That meant: "We are not going to use any ammunition here; we are not going to have any fighting. It is all going where it belongs—where McClellan is."

(See also testimony of Surgeon William L. Faxon, Thirty-second Massachusetts, proceedings of board, page 844.) He says:

As I crossed the run [at Bristoe] I heard General Porter make this remark: "Go tell Morell to halt his division. I don't care a damn if I don't get there."

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? Did not this same Surgeon Faxon, who heard that wonderful remark, describe the man who made it as wearing a major-general's uniform; and was it not proven that General Porter, at that time, never had worn a major-general's uniform, and had not one with him at all? That all appears in the evidence.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It may be so. I will allow the gentleman to answer that question in his own time.

This fairly exhibits the spirit of dislike, distrust, contempt, and insubordination which Porter indulged toward Pope. Nor was he alone in it. McClellan appears to have been in sympathy with Porter. At 3.30 p. m., August 29, he telegraphed Halleck:

I am clear that one of two courses must be adopted. First, to concentrate all our available forces and open communication with Pope, and second, to leave Pope to get out of his scrape, &c., at once using all our means to make the capital safe.

And again, to Halleck:

I have no confidence in the dispositions made as I gather them. To speak frankly, and the occasion requires it, there appears to be a total absence of brains.

It is in the light of this spirit of insubordination that we must interpret Porter's conduct on the 28th and 29th of August, 1862.

The second order on the 29th to Porter was brought by General Gibbon in person, and delivered at the Weir house.

It was as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, August 29, 1862.

Push forward with your corps and King's division, which you will take with you, upon Gainesville. I am following the enemy down the Warrenton turnpike. Be expeditious or we will lose much.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

How came Gibbon to bring this order? There are gentlemen here who were with Gibbon the night before at Groveton. Coming down the Warrenton pike from the west a little before dusk, leading McDowell's corps, being ordered to move on Centreville, Gibbon ran into the right of Stonewall Jackson's command. A fierce action ensued, in which Gibbon lost several hundred men.

Mr. BRAGG. Seven hundred and seventy out of his four regiments.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I think the gentleman is correct. He was there, and knows. After the fight was over, General King, at 1 o'clock that night, withdrew the corps from the Warrenton pike, near Groveton, and came down to Manassas Junction. Gibbon, who had made the fight, knew that this had opened the door for Longstreet to join Jackson, the very thing he knew General Pope did not wish to happen. General Gibbon mounted his horse and rode with all speed by way of Manassas Junction to Centreville—with such speed that he broke down his horse and had to have a relay with which to return. He there had a conference with Pope; explained the situation; explained King's withdrawal from the Warrenton pike, and how the door had been opened for Longstreet. General Pope then gave him the order to Porter which I have just read:

Push forward with your corps and King's division, which you will take with you, upon Gainesville. I am following the enemy down the Warrenton pike. Be expeditious, or we will lose much.

Gibbon with that order galloped at full speed, met Porter about 8 o'clock a. m. at the Weir house, near Manassas Junction, and delivered the order to Porter. At that time Porter had left his bivouac near Bristoe. The head of Sykes's division was at the station, right where the cars were burned, as witnesses have testified. The head of Morell's division had just got up to the turning point where the Gainesville road turns from the Bristoe Station road, about a mile west from Manassas. Immediately orders were sent back to halt the column. Sykes was already halted. Morell, I think, was halted also. To save the time of countermarching Sykes's division, Morell was ordered to proceed at once on the Gainesville road and Sykes to follow. The march proceeds for about 4 miles, when they arrive at a small stream, or rather the bed of a stream, known as Dawkin's Branch. It was now about 11 o'clock in the morning. Porter's corps consisted of Morell's division, Sykes's division of regulars, Piatt's brigade, and thirty-six pieces of artillery. Arriving at Dawkin's Branch, the column halted. Right there they met a horseman, who had just come from Gainesville over the road, and reported the road clear, but the enemy's skirmishers at Gainesville. A conference took place. Some skirmishers were sent forward across the branch. A few scattering shots were fired from along the woods, perhaps a thousand yards in advance of Porter's head of column. Warren closed up his brigade en masse on the left of the road.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman explain what is the distance from Gainesville to Dawkin's Branch?

Mr. CUTCHEON. About 5 miles. Morell deployed Griffin's brigade to the right of the road. Warren, as I have said, was massed on the left. Two companies were deployed at the front as skirmishers. Porter and Morell had been there about half an hour deliberating what further they would do when General McDowell came to the front of the column bearing an order he had just received from General Pope—which order, by the way, Porter had already received. That order was as follows, known as the joint order:

[General Orders, No. 5.]

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, August 29, 1862.

Generals McDOWELL and PORTER:

You will please move forward with your joint commands toward Gainesville. I send General Porter written orders to that effect an hour and a half ago. Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno are moving on the Warrenton turnpike, and must be not far from Gainesville. I desire that as soon as communication is established between this force and your own the whole command shall halt. It may be necessary to fall back behind Bull Run, at Centreville, to-night. I presume it will be so on account of our supplies. I have sent no orders of any description to Ricketts, and none to interfere in any way with the movements of McDowell's troops, except what I sent by his aid-de-camp last night, which were to hold his position on the Warrenton pike until the troops from here should fall upon the enemy's flank and rear. I do not even know Ricketts's position, as I have not been able to find out where General McDowell was until a late hour this morning. General McDowell will take immediate steps to communicate with General Ricketts, and instruct him to rejoin the other divisions of his corps as soon as practicable. If any considerable advantages are to be gained by departing from this order it will not be strictly carried out. One thing must be had in view, that the troops must occupy a position from which they can reach Bull Run to-night or by morning. The indications are that the whole force of the enemy is moving in this direction at a pace that will bring them here by to-morrow night or next day. My own headquarters will be for the present with Heintzelman's corps or at this place.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

The disobedience of this order was the second specification of the first charge.

Now, right here is about the only time I wish to refer at all to this map. Here [illustrating] is Warrentown pike, extending in a southwesterly direction from Centreville to Gainesville. Here is the Alexandria and Orange Railroad; this is the Manassas Gap Railroad, extending northwesterly from Manassas to Gainesville. They form a junction here at Gainesville, at an acute angle. Here were Heintzelman and Reno, moving upon the Warrenton pike from Centreville westward. Here was Fitz-John Porter, half way between Manassas and Gainesville, facing northwesterly. Jackson's line extended in a southwesterly direction from Sudley Ford to the turnpike west of Groveton. Here were the Union forces fronting them. Here were Reno, Hooker, and Sigel on the Union right, and Reynolds on the extreme left, at the Lewis house. Here was Morell, at Dawkin's Branch. Here was Sykes, stretched along the road back to Bethlehem church. Here was McDowell, extending along the road back toward Manassas; and Ricketts was off here extending back toward Bristoe. That was the situation at 11 o'clock. Now, what was the object of General Pope? It was to have General Porter advance upon this Gainesville road until his right had reached out and grasped hands with Reynolds, who was here between the Lewis house and Groveton [illustrating]. Now, what was in front of him? So far as he knew, nothing in the world but skirmishers. General Warren, a good friend of Porter's, testified as follows, on page 83 of volume 2 of the proceedings of the Schofield board:

Q. So far as you know was there an enemy in that position at that time?
A. We could see as far as the woods allowed us. We could see them along the edges of the woods. There was no knowing whether they were in force or not. We should have had to make a demonstration to find out what it was. I know very often we did not see the enemy's line of battle when it was very heavy.

* * * * * * *

Q. You did not know what force of the enemy was in your front?
A. No; I did not know how great they were. I knew there was a force.
Q. You saw enough there to make you cautious in your movements?
A. Yes. In making a military maneuver no man is justified in going upon the uncertainties of the occasion. If he does not know what force is in his front he should make an effort to develop it.

That is what I say; that is what it seems to me every soldier ought to say—if you do not know what force is in your front you ought to make a movement to develop the enemy's force and find out.

But I must press on, as I see my time is short.

Porter had been advised by the 3 a. m. order that a battle was expected; that Hooker and Kearny were to attack; that Sigel was on their left to extend the line. He knew the purpose of his march on Gainesville was to unite his right with Reynolds's left—that his order was to advance until communication was established. He was to fight if need be. This communication was not established. No bona fide attempt was made to establish it.

After the brief interview (not exceeding fifteen minutes) between Porter and McDowell, in which McDowell said, "Put your troops in here, and I will take mine and go to the right," Porter, instead of remaining at the front at Dawkin's Branch, left the head of his column, went 2¾ miles to the rear, lay down in the shade by Bethlehem church, and remained there until dark. He never visited the head of his column again that day until it was dark. I defy refutation of this statement.

I say, then, that this absolute absence of vigor, this complete lack of attempt to carry out his order, his retirement from the head of his column to Bethelehem church, where he could neither see nor hear nor know what was going on, his inaction while the sounds of battle were constantly throbbing in his ears, can only be explained upon the hypothesis of a want of good faith, a purpose "to let Pope get out of his scrape" as best he could. Thus far, from the moment he joined Pope, he had not promptly and in a soldierly manner obeyed one solitary order that he had received from his commander.

He had acted upon the order to march to Bristoe in his own time and in his own manner. When he received the order to march on Centreville "at the first dawn of day" to take part in a battle, he was an hour after sunrise still in his tent writing captious dispatches and wishing that "Mac will soon get us out of this."

When, at 9 a. m., he is ordered to fill his cartridge-boxes he says, indifferently, to Colonel Smith, that the ammunition "was where it belonged;" it "was on its way to Alexandria, where we are all going." At Dawkin's Branch he said, "we can't go in there anywhere without getting into a fight."

His whole demeanor manifested the most utter want of earnestness or desire for the success of the army. His whole correspondence with Burnside showed that he did not regard that as his army; that he wanted to be away from it; that he had a most hearty dislike for its commander; that he looked to "Mac" as his patron, monitor, and favorite. What attempt did he make to cross over to Sigel? If any gentleman can tell me of any I shall be glad. I am told that Griffin moved his brigade six hundred yards to the right. So he did. He deployed this brigade, a magnificent brigade, and moved to the right until the head of column reached some pine bushes, when somebody said, "You can not get through there," and immediately he halted his column, faced about, and went into the brush at Dawkin's Branch. That was the only attempt to connect with the right.

Porter's process of reasoning was a simple one. If Pope gains the prestige of a victory, then Pope will command the united armies. If Pope is beaten, then the army must fall back within the lines of Washington, Pope will be a failure, and "McClellan's star" will shine out once more.

His reasoning was not only simple, it was sound, as the sequel too surely proved.

He was found guilty of disobedience to the "joint order;" but thus far he could make a show of excuse for his disobedience: he was out of the presence of his commander; the discretion allowed to a corps commander; obstacles in the way of a strict obedience, and other excuses.

But

changed all this. It was given on the very field of battle. It was given by his immediate commander under circumstances when the subordinate had but one duty, and that was to obey at once, fully, and with all his energy.

That order was as follows:

HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD,
August 29—4.30 p. m.

Major-General PORTER:

Your line of march brings you in on the enemy's right flank. I desire you to push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and, if possible, on his rear, keeping your right in communication with General Reynolds. The enemy is massed in the woods in front of us, but can be shelled out as soon as you engage their flank. Keep heavy reserves and use your batteries, keeping well closed to your right all the time. In case you are obliged to fall back, do so to your right and rear, so as to keep you in close communication with the right wing.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

All that afternoon the roar of battle was sounding in his ears, or at least it would have been had he not been 2½ miles from the head of his own column.

Here was an imperative order, an order to attack. It admitted of no misconstruction. There was no discretion. If a battle was raging, there was no recourse but to obey at once.

McDowell says, speaking of the time he was conferring with Porter, before 12 o'clock:

The sound of battle, which seemed to be at its height on our right toward Groveton. (G. C. M., 83 [85].)

* * * * * * *

Q. Was or not the battle raging at that time?

A. The battle was raging on our right. That is, if you regard that road from Bethlehem church to Gainesville to be substantially northwest, the battle was raging to the right and east of that line. (G. C. M. [86] 85.)

If no battle was raging, it was equally imperative.

A new excuse must be found. It was found.

The excuse was that the order was received too late for execution. Now, Mr. Chairman, how much of my time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has forty-five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I find I must hurry on.

The order was dispatched from Stone house at 4.30. It was borne by Capt. Douglas Pope, a staff officer. The distance to Bethlehem church was just 5 miles. He swears he believes he delivered it by 5 o'clock. (G. C. M., page 60.) The course of subsequent events shows that it must have been delivered as early as 5.30. Charles Duffer, orderly, says about 5.30, (G. C. M., page 201). Archelaus Dyer, First Ohio, puts it at 5.15. (Board proceedings, page 1097.)

Warren's dispatch, dated at 5.45 (Board proceeding, page 81), which says, "I met then an orderly from General Porter to General Morell, saying he must push on and press the enemy," shows that the order must have been received by 5.30.

There is no doubt whatever that the order General Warren speaks of, which had already reached him before 5.45, was the very order sent to Morell to make the attack in obedience to the 4.30 order. Warren says:

5.45 p. m. August 29, 1862, I received an order to go to the support of Morell. I faced about and did so.

The sun set that evening at 6.36 o'clock. When the order was received the sun was an hour high. This was 5.45. Already the order had reached Porter at Bethlehem church; already it had been carried 2 miles to the front, and had reached the front before sunset that night at 6.36, fully an hour before sunset.

Mr. BRAGG. Permit me to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. Colonel Locke went forward with the order that he received—that 4.30 order.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I understand all about that.

Mr. BRAGG. That 4.30 order, as subsequent dispatches brought by General McDowell himself at West Point dated at 6.30 showed, that order had not been received by Porter at all.

Allow me to say the testimony shows that two witnesses stated subsequently they did not know anything about the time they delivered the order.

Mr. CUTCHEON. With all due respect to the gallant commander of the Iron Brigade, and we love him for the enemies he has made [laughter and applause], I want to say there were three orders to attack that went to Morell that afternoon. First, the written order of General Porter to push out two regiments supported by two others to attack the party with the section of artillery in front. That was late in the afternoon. What did General Porter then suppose was in his front? He says "the party with a section of artillery in front."

General Morell says nothing was ever done under that order. The next order was a verbal one carried by Colonel Locke to General Morell to make preparation for attack. That was followed up by a written order, carried by an orderly, to attack.

It was a written order. It was not a verbal order. He could not read a verbal order. It was the written order carried by an orderly when there was a full hour before sunset. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BRAGG. The gentleman should read the documents before him.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I have read three thousand pages of this evidence, and I think I know what I am talking about all the time. Morell was already deployed, or partly so. The skirmishers were already out and in contact with the enemy. Warren was massed on the left of the road behind the branch. The batteries, or some of them, were already in position to cover the advance. Wilcox, of Longstreet's corps, with his division, had been already withdrawn from Longstreet's right to the Warrenton pike, and, together with Hood and Kemper, was pressing down upon Pope's left to crush it back with the last fierce charge of the day, forcing the battle until 9 o'clock that night. Where was Porter then? What was he doing? And only echo answers, where! How did he receive this order to attack? Reclining upon the ground back of Bethlehem church, 2⅝ miles from the front of his column. Sykes was with him, the commander of the regular division, the finest division in the Army. Did he inform Sykes that he was ordered to attack? Not at all. Did he direct him to prepare his division to advance? Did he cause the assembly to be sounded? Did he do anything to indicate that he intended to attempt to obey the order?

General Sykes, before the court-martial, testified as follows (page 178):

Q. Do you know the officer who on the 29th of August bore to General Porter the order of which you have spoken?

A. I do not.

Q. Do you know whether you saw him when he first arrived, or was it on the second arrival?

A. I think it was on his first arrival. General Porter and I were seated together at the time.

Q. Was there any action taken or any order issued immediately on the receipt of the message which that officer bore?

A. I think that some aids-de-camp of General Porter were sent out. I am not positive on that point; but I think Captain Monteith was sent out.

Q. Did General Porter make known to you the character of that order?

A. He did not.

Q. Did he read it in your presence?

A. Not that I know of.

Q. Did you see any order delivered to him by this messenger?

A. I saw a communication delivered to him. I do not know whether it was this order or not.

Q. How long did you remain with General Porter on that occasion after the receipt of this order?

A. I continued with him from that time all night.

Q. You had then, as I understand you to say, no knowledge that a positive order had been given by General Pope on that afternoon for General Porter to attack the enemy on the right flank?

A. I had no such knowledge.

Porter rides to the front, and that is the end of it. "It was quite dark." Yes; it was very dark then in more senses than one. He was justly convicted of disobedience to the 4.30 order to attack.

Next came the following peremptory order, which shows how Pope regarded Porter's conduct:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
In the Field, near Bull Run, August 29, 1862—8.50 p. m.

Maj. Gen. F. J. PORTER:

GENERAL: Immediately upon receipt of this order, the precise hour of receiving which you will acknowledge, you will march your command to the field of battle of to-day and report to me in person for orders. You are to understand that you are expected to comply strictly with this order, and to be present on the field within three hours after its reception, or after daybreak to-morrow morning.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

(Received August 30, 3.30 a. m.)

The tone of this order is such as to be insulting in the higest degree to a faithful and subordinate officer.

He might as well have said in so many words, "You have been insubordinate; now you must obey!"

We know that before sending this order Pope had been inclined to order the arrest of Porter for his failure to attack, but had been dissuaded. "What will you say of the 30th," I have been asked. On the 30th Porter was under the immediate eye of Pope. He was stung, evidently, by the order, its tone of reprimand and distrust. And that day he had no choice but fight, and the old Fifth Corps fought as it always fought when it had a chance, with heroic valor. But the desperate valor with which that noble corps fought on the 30th can have nothing to do with the conduct of its commander on the 27th, 28th, and 29th of August.

Pity that so much sacrifice should have been required and so much precious blood wasted to repair the insubordination of the day before.

Such were the events which gave rise to and dismissal of General Porter.

THE COURT-MARTIAL

That court convened on the 27th of November, 1862. It sat for forty-five days. It was the most elaborate military trial the country ever witnessed.

The court itself was composed of distinguished officers. The following was the detail for the court:

Maj. Gen. D. Hunter, United States Volunteers.
Maj. Gen. E. A. Hitchcock, United States Volunteers.
Brig. Gen. Rufus King, United States Volunteers.
Brig. Gen. B. M. Prentiss, United States Volunteers.
Brig. Gen. James B. Ricketts, United States Volunteers.
Brig. Gen. Silas Casey, United States Volunteers.
Brig. Gen. James A. Garfield, United States Volunteers.
Brig. Gen. N. B. Buford, United States Volunteers.

Col. J. Holt, Judge-Advocate-General, United State Army, judge-advocate and recorder of the court.

On the 10th day of January, 1863, the court rendered its verdict. It found him guilty of three specifications under each of two charges. The merciful sentence was that he should be cashiered. On the 13th the findings were transmitted to the Secretary of War to be laid before President Lincoln. On the 19th the review of the Judge-Advocate-General was laid before the President. On the 21st the President "approved" and confirmed the sentence and carried it into execution. That should have been final. In any other government it would have been final.

Of the thousands of officers and soldiers who have been condemned by courts-martial this case alone is selected for a legislative acquittal—to be legislated into innocence by act of Congress.

However Porter may have lacked in energy on the 27th, 28th, and 29th of August, 1862, he has not lacked in energy since in his efforts to secure the reversal of the verdict of the court; immediately commenced his appeals for a rehearing:

1. Appeal to Grant as Secretary of War, 1866.
2. Appeal to Grant as General, in 1867.
3. Appeal to Grant as President, in 1869.
4. Appeal to Grant as President, in 1874.
5. Appeal to President Hayes, in 1878.

ORDER FOR THE SCHOFIELD BOARD.

Three military gentlemen were invited to compile statements, "that the President may be informed of the facts." It was not a court-martial; not a court of inquiry.

As to the want of power of this board see minority report, page 3:

Not one sentence of the so-called testimony taken before the Schofield board could ever be used as evidence before any court of law or equity in the land. That board had no legal existence; they were bound by no oath of office. The hearing was ex parte; there was no process of subpœna for witnesses; no fund to pay their expenses; no person officially charged with the duty of supporting the verdict of the court. No lawful oath was or could be administered to witnesses; no penalty could be imposed for false swearing.

The board perfectly understood this. On page 5 of the proceedings of the board, the president of the board says:

"There is one other matter in regard to which the board would like to hear what counsel have to say; that is in regard to receiving testimony in a case like this, this being a board having no organization under the law; no power to summon witnesses or to administer oaths."

Mr. Bullett, of counsel for petitioner, said:

"It is true that the board have no power to administer oaths as far as we can ascertain. * * * As a matter of course many persons may be influenced by the fact that this is not a judicial proceeding; hence the question of perjury might not apply."

On page 6 of the proceedings (Ex. Doc. 37, part 2, Forty-sixth Congress, first session, page 68), the recorder says:

"If the board please, I suppose that the administration of an oath, even by an officer competent to administer oaths, would give no increased validity to statements that may be made here, but it might influence some in the manner in which they would give their statements. * * * Of course we know that that which is said here is not in any legal sense evidence, but merely statements."

March 19, 1879, the Schofield board made its report; but so deeply grounded was the confidence of the American people in the court that originally tried him and the President who approved its findings that the report made no perceptible change in the popular conviction that Porter had been justly convicted and dismissed.

The defense made before this board was identical with that made before the court-martial.

As the board themselves say in their report:

The recent testimony of confederate officers hardly adds anything to the conclusiveness of that proof, but rather diminishes its force, by showing that one division (Anderson's) did not arrive until the next morning; while the information in their possession at that time required the Union officers to assume that that division as well as the others had arrived on the 29th.

The report of the board is a most extraordinary one. It not only absolutely acquits Porter, not only finds him perfectly free of all blame or fault, but it exhausts the vocabulary of eulogy and praise to heap the most fulsome panegyric upon him.

If the report of the Schofield board is a correct judgment in the case, then the court-martial was a hideous conspiracy, to which the General-in-Chief, the War Secretary, the Judge-Advocate-General, and the great and tender-hearted Lincoln were all parties, to sacrifice Porter as a scapegoat for the failure of a campaign then already retrieved. It was not until after it became known that General Grant had espoused Porter's cause, and written to President Arthur to that effect, about December 22, 1881, that the people who had never studied the case for themselves, and who depended upon others for their opinions, began to think that the court-martial might have erred in its judgment. So long as Garfield lived Porter remained quiet. But scarcely had the last painful breath departed from his anguish-racked body when Porter commenced his advances upon the Arthur administration. He knew perfectly well the reverence in which the whole Northern people held the great names of Stanton, Garfield, and Lincoln, and the only possible way to counteract the mighty weight of these names was to throw into the opposite scale a name as great as or even greater than these, the name of Grant.

Garfield was but lately dead. His long and terrible suffering and most pathetic death had made all hearts tender. It was a time for effacing all the scars of war. Four times already Porter had appealed to Grant—in 1866 and 1867, when Grant was General and Secretary of War respectively; to these appeals Grant had turned a deaf ear. Once more, in 1869, when Grant was President and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy—when his power, backed by an overwhelming majority in Congress, was almost unlimited—Porter pressed his appeal. We must presume that the President, as he himself has declared, gave it careful attention. Again he declined to take any action. At this time the newly discovered evidence of Lee and Longstreet was laid before the President.

Once more in 1874, while General Grant was still President, Porter made one more appeal, at this time presenting the additional evidence of Hood, Wilcox, Early, Owens, and Robertson, covering substantially all the ground covered by the board of review, yet without effect.

It was at this time that General Pope wrote to President Grant, among other things saying:

As I do not wish even to seem to consent to any additional misconception concerning me or my action in this case, I beg (if you have not already done so) that you will yourself, Mr. President, examine as fully into the question as you think justice or mercy demands.

To this, under date of May 9, 1874, General Grant replied as follows:

* * * You are under the apprehension that I had not fully examined the case. * * * I read during the trial the evidence and the final findings of the court, looking upon the whole trial as one of great importance, and particulary so to the Army and Navy. When General Porter's subsequent defense was published I received a copy of it and read it with care and attention, determined if he had been wronged and I could right him I would do so. My conclusion was that no new facts were developed that could be fairly considered, and that it was of doubtful legality whether by mere authority of the Executive a rehearing could be given.

Yours, truly,

U. S. GRANT.

General JOHN POPE,
United States Army.

President Grant's term of office expired March 4, 1877.

March 9, 1878, General Porter made an appeal to President Hayes. The result was that on the 12th of April the order was issued convening the "Schofield board," consisting of General J. M. Schofield, General A. H. Terry, and Col. George W. Getty: certainly not more distinguished officers than composed the court-martial.

They were appointed by the President on his own motion, without any authority of law.

On March 19, 1879, the board made its report. It was an astonishing document—elaborate, ingenious, the thoroughly partisan plea of an advocate rather than the impartial and candid summing of a judge.

Of all the able and accomplished attorneys who have been employed and paid by Porter in this case, not one has ever made a plea so extravagant, so partisan, so one-sided.

But the great mass of the people, as I have already said, continued to believe that Porter was righteously stripped of the dignities and honors which his country had bestowed upon him. But when, near the beginning of 1882, it became known that our greatest soldier, he who had been our "first in war and first in peace," had brought his powerful advocacy to Porter's cause, many who had neither the time nor the means of examining for themselves yielded their long-settled convictions.

We now find attached to and made a part of the majority report in this case a letter written by General Grant under date of November 23, 1882, directed to General Porter, in which he exonerates him from all blame. This letter being thus made a part and parcel of the majority report, it becomes pertinent and important, as we honor the names of Lincoln and Garfield equally with that of Grant, that we should understand the reason and the basis of this great change—for the opinion of no man of this generation is entitled to more careful consideration and more profound respect at our hands than the opinion of General Grant.

But when we further consider that for nineteen years Grant himself believed Porter guilty as charged, and that too after being four times appealed to, and after reading Porter's defense "with care and attention," and when we find in the letter embodied in the majority report the reasons alleged for his change of belief, it behooves us to examine those reasons with great care.

No man's opinion is worth more than his reasons are worth. And this is true of the greatest as well as of the humblest. No man is equally great in all directions, and we have been sadly reminded of this truth since the last argument of this cause. I am convinced that this change in General Grant's expressed opinion was due to errors and influences easily traced.

I hold in my hand a pamphlet entitled, "General Grant's Unpublished Correspondence in the Case of General Fitz-John Porter." This pamphlet presumably and unquestionably has been printed since the death of General Grant by the authority of Porter himself. It embraces a correspondence extending from September, 1866, to July, 1884, and covers the four rejected appeals of 1866, 1867, 1869, and 1874. During all this long period and down to December, 1881, General Grant firmly believed Porter to be guilty. If he had continued to believe the facts to be as he had previously understood them, he would have continued to believe him guilty to the day of his death. Were those facts as he had understood them or were they not? These nineteen years of firm belief of the great general should not go for nothing, especially when during most of this time he was under official responsibility in the matter.

These letters are an exceedingly valuable contribution to the literature of the case. By their light we are able to understand, I think, in what manner and by what process and by what extent of actual study the change was wrought. The first of these letters, which are significant, is that on page 7, from Porter to Grant.

NEW YORK, September 17, 1881.

DEAR GENERAL: I have been told that you have entertained and sometimes expressed opinions reflecting upon the integrity of my military acts while in the Army. While I have always been unwilling to believe these reports, I can not help taking them to heart, as I am willing to acknowledge that it would be a matter of wonder if you did not entertain opinions adverse to me, considering the light under which you may have expressed them. * * *

Believe me, very respectfully yours,

F. J. PORTER.

General U. S. GRANT, Long Branch, N. J.

To which General Grant replied:

NEW YORK, September 27, 1881.

DEAR GENERAL: Your letter of the 17th of September was handed me at Long Branch the day after the death of the President. Since that time I have had no opportunity of seeing you, and hence have deferred writing until this time. For a few days I will be so busily employed that I am not able now to appoint a time for the conference which you desire to have with me, but as soon as I can fix a day I will take great pleasure in doing so, and will hear what you have to say in regard to the matter alluded to in your letter, and will endeavor to listen without prejudice, and if convinced that I am wrong in former opinions entertained and, possibly, expressed, I would be willing to correct them.

Very truly, yours,

U. S. GRANT.

General F. J. PORTER, 119 Liberty Street, New York.

This fixes the fact that up to September 27, 1881, three years after the Schofield board, General Grant had not changed his opinion.

He writes again under date—

NEW YORK, October 31, 1881.

DEAR GENERAL: Since my letter to you I have been so busy with correspondence and callers each day that I have not been able to designate a particular time to see you.

If you will call any day, however, at my office, 99 Broadway, about 11 o'clock, I will give you the interview desired, and will keep persons from coming in my office during the time you are with me.

Very truly, yours,

U. S. GRANT.

General F. J. PORTER.

Up to October 31 he had no time even for an interview. Nothing had occurred to change his mind.

Congress was about to meet. Porter was anxious to have General Grant's decision at an early day, as upon it depended whether his renewed appeal should be made through the President or direct to Congress. He therefore sent the following note:

NEW YORK, December 1, 1881.

GENERAL: I would be glad of an interview with you to-day, if agreeable, or to-morrow, if more convenient to you.

Yours, truly,

F. J. PORTER.

General U. S. GRANT.

This note was returned, indorsed as follows (December 1, 1881):

I will be glad to see you at any time you may call, but your papers I carried to my house to go over carefully, but as to yet I have had company every evening at the house—the only time I am there—so I have not yet examined them sufficiently to say anything. I think I can safely say, however, that you will not meet with opposition from me in obtaining relief from the odium of your sentence. After examining the papers before me—which I will do within a few days, if I have to shut myself up for the purpose—if my judgment convinces me that you have been wronged, I will say so.

U. S. GRANT.

The interview did not take place, Porter preferring to wait till the general had formed his convictions.

This is the language of Porter's pamphlet.

From this letter it will be observed that General Grant had been so occupied that he had been able to give little or no attention to the papers sent him by Porter. Yet his mind, by some means, has reached a point where he is able to say, "I think I can safely say, however, that you will not meet with opposition from me in obtaining relief," &c.

Before this, in chronological order, should come in two letters which for some occult reason have been taken out of their proper order and placed at the end of the pamphlet. They are important as showing what new documents, what new evidence were furnished General Grant for his information.

The first one is dated four days after General Grant's letter of October 31, when Grant had not had time to examine the papers, and is as follows:

NEW YORK, November 4, 1881.

DEAR GENERAL: If, after you have read the report of the board and my letter to General COX, you should need any further light or information or proof to sustain anything put forth by the board or by me, I shall be very glad to give it. Yesterday I saw plainly that your impressions of the facts in the case were incorrect, and I am anxious that you should see the facts in their true light, and the more so as the matter was once in your hands to act upon, but you did not act upon, I presume, because of such impressions as you expressed yesterday.

I will try to present my case to you clearly and dispassionately, believing that you will receive them as dispassionately and free from prejudice, and with as great a desire to undo any wrong unintentionally done as you would have done right in the first case.

My statement sent to you yesterday was mainly written in 1863, added to as time sustained my views by proofs, and but slightly altered by my counsel for presentation to the Schofield board. The foot-notes were added after the adjournment of the board, and when the Senate was printing the proceedings. * * *

Respectfully yours,

F. J. PORTER.

From this we see that up to "yesterday" (November 3) Grant's "impressions of the facts of the case were incorrect." We also see the subtle appeal to his feelings, because "the matter was once in your hands to act upon, but you did not act." It also shows the papers furnished by Porter. They were "the report of the board," "my letter to General COX," "my statement sent you yesterday," "mainly written in 1863," "the foot-notes added after the adjournment of the board."

The following comes immediately after the last, without date, and seems to be a postscript to it. (Date would be November 4.)

GENERAL U. S. GRANT: I inclose a copy of my defense before the court-martial, written by Mr. Eames and prepared from the imperfect evidence of fact on the record, but at that time—with the obstacles thrown in the way of getting evidence—all the evidence I could bring forward. It is substantially the same argument as now made.

Yours, respectfully,

F. J. PORTER.

So that by Porter's own admission the case made to General Grant was "substantially the same" that was made before the court-martial in 1863. No more, no less, in substance.

We may also see what he did not have:

NEW YORK, December 23, 1881.

DEAR SIR: * * * I will be pleased if you will send me a copy of the proceedings of the board, as published by the Senate.

Truly yours,

U. S. GRANT.

General F. J. PORTER, New York.

It would seem that he did not have the proceedings of the board, which contained the evidence in the case.

The next letter (but dated the day before) is to President Arthur, and shows the amount of time given to the study of the case:

NEW YORK, December 22, 1881.

DEAR SIR: At the request of General Fitz-John Porter I have recently reviewed his trial and the testimony furnished before the Schofield court of inquiry, held in 1879, giving to the subject three full days of careful reading and consideration, and much thought in the intervening time. The reading of the whole of this record has thoroughly convinced me that for these nineteen years I have been doing a gallant and efficient soldier a very great injustice in thought, and sometimes in speech.

* * * * * * * *

I am, very truly, yours,

U. S. GRANT.

The PRESIDENT, Washington, D. C.

I desire to make only one comment upon this correspondence.

It is admitted that the argument made to Grant in 1881 was substantially the same as made to Garfield as a member of the court, who was solemnly sworn to try the case "without fear, favor, affection, or hope of reward," in 1863.

Grant gave to the case three days—at least all the time he could give to it in "three full days."

Garfield give to it forty-five full days.

Grant had only one side presented to him.

Garfield had both sides, on the facts, but argument only for the defense.

Garfield had all the living witnesses before him. He looked into their eyes, witnessed their bearing, heard the tones of their voice, saw them under the fire of cross-examination.

Grant had none of these.

Garfield added to the honor and chivalry of the soldier the intellectual discipline, the logical mind, the keen discrimination of the trained lawyer.

Grant, with that kind-hearted magnanimity which in his later years made him desire the good-will of every heart that had in any way been wounded by the unhappy strife of war, and feeling that when he had this man absolutely in his hands he had been wholly deaf to his appeal, was unquestionably disposed to place the most optimistic construction upon every act and apparent neglect of duty.

Grant had before him everything that would exculpate, nothing that would condemn.

But in the letter which forms a part of the majority report General

Grant has given us for himself the reasons for his change of mind. This letter, as embodied in the report, bears date November 3, 1883. In the pamphlet of General Porter it is dated November 23. I shall incorporate only a portion of it in my remarks:

NEW YORK, November 3, 1883.

DEAR GENERAL: As there is some discussion as to the probable reasons for my change of mind in regard to your case, now pending before the people of the United States, I deem it proper that I should give them myself.

In the first place, I never believed you to be a traitor, as many affected to believe. I thought I knew you too well to believe for one moment that you would accept the pay, rank, and command you held for the purpose of betraying the cause you were professing to serve. Then, too, your services had been too conspicuous as a staff officer at the beginning of the war and as commander of troops later, to support such a theory for a moment.

But I did believe that General Pope was so odious to some of the officers in the East that a cordial support was not given him by them. I was disposed, too, to accept the verdict of a court-martial composed as the one which tried you was. Some of the members of that court I knew personally, and had great confidence in their judgment and justice. I supposed you had shared in this feeling toward Pope, and while not more guilty than others, you were unfortunate in being placed in a position where specifications could be made showing this hostility.

After the close of the war, when I was requested to read your new defense, I read it with the feeling above described. At the same time I read the other side as prepared—or furnished—by General Pope. This gave maps showing the positions of the two armies substantially as shown by the first of the diagrams presented by Mr. Lord, of San Francisco, from whom I copied the article in your case, and did not indicate the presence of any other force than Jackson's. Then, too, it appeared that you had actually received an order at about 5 or 5.30 in the afternoon of August 29 to attack the enemy's flank, and that, too, at a time when a fierce battle was raging in the front.

I was first shaken in my views, however, when such a man as General Terry—who unites the lawyer with the soldier—a man of high character and ability, and who had believed as I had and possibly worse, after many weeks of investigation, should entirely vindicate you and be sustained, too, by men of the known ability of his colleagues on the board. Until in 1881, when I re-examined for myself, my belief was that, [1] on the 29th of August, 1862, a great battle was fought between General Pope, commanding the Union forces, and General Jackson, commanding the confederate forces; [2] that you, with a corps of twelve or more thousand men, stood in a position across the right flank of Jackson, and where you could easily get into his rear; [3] that you received an order to do so about 5 or 5.30 o'clock, which you refused to obey because of clouds of dust in your front, which you contended indicated an enemy in superior force to you; [4] that you allowed Pope to get beaten while you stood idly looking on without raising an arm to help him. With this understanding, and without a doubt as to the correctness of it, I condemned you.

Now, on a full investigation of the facts, I find that the battle was fought on the 30th of August; that your corps, commanded directly by you in person, lost a greater percentage than any other corps engaged; that the 4.30 order of the day before did not reach you until night-fall; that your immediate superior had cautioned you early in the day that you were too far out to the front then; that General Pope had cautioned you against bringing on an engagement except under such circumstances as he described, and that in any event you must be prepared to fall back behind Bull Run that night, where it would be necessary for you to be to receive supplies; that from 11 o'clock of the 29th you were confronted by a force of twice your own number, of whose presence you had positive proof, while General Pope did not know of it.

Your knowledge of this fact, as well as of the fact that you had another force, quite double yours, in addition in your front, would have been sufficient justification for your not attacking, even if the order had been received in time. Of course this would not apply if a battle had been raging between Jackson and Pope. At the hour you received the order all was quiet.

* * * * * * *

Faithfully yours,

U. S. GRANT.

General F. J. PORTER.

General Grant says he condemned Porter because he believed four things:

1. That a great battle was fought on the 29th of August, 1862.
2. That Porter stood with a corps of twelve thousand or more men across the enemy's right flank.
3. That he received an order to attack which he failed to obey.
4. That he allowed Pope to get beaten while he stood idly looking on.

Believing this, he for nineteen years condemned Porter.

If these suppositions were correct Grant would still have condemned him.

1. I think that I have already shown that Porter did stand "with a corps of twelve thousand or more men" across the enemy's right flank.
2. That he received an order to attack which he could have obeyed, and ought to have obeyed, but did not obey.
3. That he allowed Pope to get beaten, and that too on the portion of the battlefield nearest Porter's troops, while he stood (or rather lay) idly looking on.

But he says: "I find that the battle was fought on the 30th of August."

Again he says: "Of course this would not apply if a battle had been raging between Jackson and Pope."

So that now the issue is distinctly raised, both by the letter of General Grant and by the report of the Schofield board, whether there was

A BATTLE ON AUGUST 29 AT GROVETON.

General Grant says in his letter that "until 1881 * * * my belief was that on the 29th of August, 1862, a great battle was fought." Now, here is an amazing thing, that for nineteen years the General of the Army should have believed that a great battle was fought, when, in point of fact, no battle was fought. And this great battle is made to disappear from history in the interest of the relief of Fitz-John Porter. [Applause.]

General Grant says in the majority report: "Of course this would not apply if a battle had been raging." Hence the battle must not rage! One of the great battles of the war must be wiped out to afford an excuse for Porter's not obeying a peremptory order to attack.

It appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is about time that this great historical question were settled and determined.

Since the last discussion of this bill in this House the publication of the Official Record of the War of the Rebellion has covered the epoch from August 27 to September 30, and we are permitted access to the official reports of the officers who commanded the troops on both sides upon August 29.

I propose that, so far as in me lies, this question shall be settled, that it shall be settled now and settled forever. And if any gentleman of this House shall vote for this bill—shall vote that Porter was not under obligation to obey an imperative order to attack—it shall not be upon the false and flimsy ground that there was no battle upon the 29th of August.

Before entering upon a discussion of the facts, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to some general features of battles.

The greatness of a battle depends upon several things:

1. The magnitude of the forces engaged;
2. The duration of the conflict;
3. The energy or fierceness of the collision;
4. The losses of life and force; and
5. The decisive character of the result.

There are battles, and then there are battles. There are battles that are to a finish, and then there are battles that are not to a finish. The battle of August 29 was of the latter class; so were the first two days at Gettysburg, and the first day at Shiloh. No battle lasts, as a rule, with continuous fury along the whole line all day long. That would not be possible; flesh and blood could not stand it.

In the late war it was my lot to share in some of the larger engagements, including Fredericksburg, Vicksburg, Wilderness, Spottsylvania, and Petersburg. I never knew a battle that was not made up of a series of conflicts, at different hours, and on different parts of the line with intervals between.

Perhaps the most decisive battle yet fought upon this continent was the third day at Gettysburg, yet the first signal gun was fired after 1 o'clock, and after an artillery duel of about an hour the infantry advanced to the assault.

In two hours the battle was practically over.

I know there are soldiers here who were in that battle. Do not understand me to say that there was not fighting in the morning; that there was not fighting after Pickett's division was repulsed. There was fighting all day, but the decisive battle was between 1 and 3 o'clock.

At Fredericksburg the battle commenced in the early morning by Franklin's attack on the left, was followed by Hooker on the extreme right and Sumner in the center, and was renewed at wide intervals of time and space, until the final assault by Humphrey's division was made after dark.

The same is true of the battle of the Wilderness. I think it can be said that at no one time were all the forces on either side engaged.

I propose to apply these usual and recognized tests to the action of the 29th of August to determine whether a battle, in the proper sense of that word, was fought on that day. The sources of information upon which I shall rely are the official reports of the commanding officers on either side, in most cases made immediately or very soon thereafter. These reports, with the possible exception of General Pope's, were made without any reference to Porter's case.

HEADQUARTERS, FIELD OF BATTLE.
Near Groveton, Va.—5 a. m., August 30, 1862.

Maj. Gen. H. W. HALLECK,
General-in-Chief, United States Army:

We fought a terrific battle here yesterday with the combined forces of the enemy, which lasted with continuous fury from daylight until after dark. * * *
The enemy is still in our front, but badly used up. We lost not less than eight thousand men killed and wounded. * * *

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA, September 3, 1862.

* * * * * * * *

Heintzelman marched early from Centreville toward Gainesville, closely followed by Reno.

Meantime, shortly after daylight, Sigel, and Reynolds's division of McDowell's corps, had become engaged with the enemy, who was brought to a stand, and he was soon joined by Heintzelman and Reno, and the whole line became actively engaged. Porter marched as directed, followed by King's division, which was by this time joined by Ricketts's division, which had been forced back from Thoroughfare Gap by the heavy forces of the enemy advancing to support Jackson.

As soon as I found that the enemy had been brought to a halt and was being vigorously attacked along Warrenton turnpike I sent orders to McDowell to advance rapidly on our left and attack the enemy on his flank, extending his right to meet Reynolds's left, and to Fitz-John Porter to keep the right well closed on McDowell's left and to attack the enemy in flank and rear while he was pushed in front. This would have made the line of battle of McDowell and Porter at right angles to that of the other forces engaged. The action raged furiously all day, McDowell, although previously in rear of Porter, bringing his whole corps on the field in the afternoon and taking a conspicuous part in that day's operations.

To my surprise and disappointment I received late in the afternoon from Porter a note saying that his advance had met the enemy on the flank in some force, and that he was retiring upon Manassas Junction, without attacking the enemy or coming to the assistance of our other forces, although they were engaged in a furious action only 2 miles distant and in full hearing of him. A portion of his force fell back toward Manassas, and he remained, as he afterward informed me, where he was, looking at the enemy during the whole of the afternoon of Friday and part of Friday night passing down in plain view to re-enforce the troops under Jackson without an effort to prevent it or to assist us. One, at least, of his brigades, under General Griffin, got around to Centreville and remained there during the whole of the next day's battle without coming on the field, though in full view of it, while General Griffin himself spent the day in making ill-natured strictures upon the general commanding [see paper marked D] the action in the presence of a promiscuous assemblage.

Darkness closed the action on Friday, the enemy being driven back from his position by Heintzelman's corps and Reno, concluded by a furious attack along the turnpike by King's division, of McDowell's corps, leaving his dead and wounded on the field.

I have much to say and to report to you concerning the conduct of certain officers and their commands during these operations, which I will postpone for the present. There is no doubt in the mind of any man here that the battle of Groveton would have been a decisive and complete victory on the first day had General Porter advanced as I directed him. Why he did not is yet unexplained. The whole of the heavy re-enforcements which attacked us on Saturday passed down the road from Gainesville during the whole afternoon and night of Friday, while General Porter remained in full sight of them, on their flank, between Manassas Junction and Gainesville, although he had my positive written order to attack them in flank while I was urging the battle in front. He made no attack whatever, but retired a portion of his command, at least, to Manassas, which was not near enough the next day to take any part in the action.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST CORPS, ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Near Fort De Kalb, Va., September 16, 1862.

* * * * * * * *

On the night of August 28, when the First Corps was encamped on the heights south of Young's Branch, near Bull Run, I received orders to "attack the enemy vigorously" the next morning. I accordingly made the necessary preparations at night and formed in order of battle at daybreak, having ascertained that the enemy was in considerable force beyond Young's Branch, in sight of the hills we occupied. His left wing rested on Catharpin Creek, front toward Centreville; with his center he occupied a long stretch of woods parallel with the Sudley Springs-New Market road, and his right was posted on the hills on both sides of the Centreville-Gainesville road. I therefore directed General Schurz to deploy his division on the right of Gainesville road, and by a change of direction to the left to come into position parallel with the Sudley Springs road. General Milroy, with his brigade and one battery, was directed to form the center, and to take possession of an elevation in front of the so-called "stone house," at the junction of the Gainesville and Sudley Springs roads. General Schenck, with his division, forming our left, was ordered to advance quickly to an adjoining range of hills, and to plant his batteries on these hills at an excellent range from the enemy's position.

In this order our whole line advanced from point to point, taking advantage of the ground before us, until our whole line was involved in a most vehement artillery and infantry contest. In the course of about four hours, from 6.30 to 10.30 o'clock in the morning, our whole infantry force and nearly all our batteries were engaged with the enemy, Generals Milroy and Schurz advancing 1 mile and General Schenck 2 miles from their original positions.

At this time (10.30 o'clock) the enemy threw forward large masses of infantry against our right, but was resisted firmly and driven back three times by the troops of Generals Milroy and Schurz. To assist these troops so hard pressed by overpowering numbers, exhausted by fatigue, and weakened by losses, I ordered one battery of reserve to take position on their left, and posted two pieces of artillery under Lieutenant Blume, of Schirmer's battery, supported by the Forty-first New York Volunteer Infantry, beyond their line and opposite the right flank of the enemy, who was advancing in the woods. These pieces opened fire with canister most effectively and checked the enemy's advance on that point. I now directed General Schenck to draw his lines nearer to us and to attack the enemy's right flank and rear by a change of front to the right, thereby assisting our troops in the center. This movement could not be executed by General Schenck with his whole division, as he became briskly engaged with the enemy, who tried to turn our extreme left.

At this critical moment, when the enemy had almost outflanked us on both wings, and was preparing a new attack against our center, Major-General Kearny arrived on the field of battle, and deployed by Sudley Springs road on our right, while General Reno's troops came to our support by the Gainesville turnpike. With the consent of General Reno I directed two regiments and one battery, under Brigadier-General Stevens, to take position on the right of General Schenck—the battery on an eminence in front and center of our line, where it did excellent work during the rest of the day, and where it relieved Captain Dilger's battery, which had held this position the whole morning. Three regiments were posted between General Milroy and General Schenck, and two others, with two mountain howitzers, were sent to the assistance of General Schurz. Scarcely were these troops in position when the contest began with renewed vigor and vehemence, the enemy attacking furiously along our whole line, from the extreme right to the extreme left.

At 2 o'clock in the afternoon Genera Hooker's troops arrived on the field of battle, and were immediately ordered forward by their noble commander to participate in the battle. One brigade, under Colonel Carr, received orders, by my request, to relieve the regiments of General Schurz's division, which had maintained their ground against repeated attacks, but were now worn out and nearly without ammunition. Other regiments were sent forward to relieve Brigadier-General Milroy, whose brigade had valiantly disputed the ground against greatly superior numbers for eight hours.

During two hours, from 4 to 6 p. m., strong cannonading and musketry continued on our center and right, where General Kearny made a successful effort against the extreme left of the enemy's lines.

At 6.15 o'clock Brigadier-General King's division of Major-General McDowell's corps arrived behind our front, and advanced on the Gainesville turnpike. I do not know the real result of this movement, but from the weakness of the enemy's cannonade and the gradually decreasing musketry in the direction of General Kearny's attack, I received the impression that the enemy's resistance was broken, and that victory was on our side; and so it was. We had won the field of battle, and our army rested near the dead and wounded who had so gloriously defended the good cause of this country. (Pages 266, 267.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 17, 1862.

* * * * * * *

On Friday morning early the engagement was commenced by General Milroy on our right, in which we soon took part, and a rapid artillery fire ensued from both sides. * * * Milroy in the mean while had deployed to the right of the road, and soon became engaged with the enemy. Our division was advanced until we reached the edge of the woods and halted. In front of us was an open space (which also extended to the right of the road and to our right) beyond which was another wood. We remained here nearly an hour, the firing in the meanwhile becoming heavy on the right. The enemy had a battery very advantageously placed on a high ridge behind the woods in front of Milroy, on the right of the road. It was admirably served and entirely concealed. Our position becoming known, their fire was directed toward us. The general determined, therefore, to advance, and so pushed on across the open space in front and took position in the woods beyond. We here discovered that we were on the battle-ground of the night before, and found the hospital of Gibbon's brigade, who had engaged the enemy. The battery of the enemy still continued. We had no artillery. De Beck's and Schirmer's ammunition having given out, and Buell's battery, which had reported, after a hot contest with the enemy (who had every advantage in position and range), was compelled to retire.

It was now determined to flank the battery and capture it, and for this purpose General Schenck ordered one of his aids to reconnoiter the position. Before he returned, however, we were requested by General Milroy to assist him, as he was very heavily pressed. General Stahel was immediately ordered to proceed with his brigade to Milroy's support. It was about this time (1 or 2 o'clock) that a line of skirmishers were observed approaching us from the rear. They proved to be of General Reynolds's division. We communicated with General Reynolds at once, who took his position on our left, and at General Schenck's suggestion he sent a battery to our right in the woods for the purpose of flanking the enemy's. They secured a position, and were engaged with him about an hour, but with what result we were not informed. General Reynolds now sent us word that he had discovered the enemy bearing down upon his left in heavy columns, and that he intended to fall back to the first woods behind the cleared space, and had already put his troops in motion. We therefore accommodated ourselves to his movement. (Page 280.)

[Report of Brig. Gen. Carl Schurz, United States Army, commanding Third Division, of the battles of Groveton and Bull Run.]

HEADQUARTERS THIRD DIVISION,
Camp near Minor's Hill, September 15, 1862.

GENERAL: I have the honor to submit the following report concerning the part taken by the division under my command in the battles of the 29th and 30th of August:

On the evening of the 28th of August my division was encamped south of the turnpike leading from Centreville to Gainesville, near Mrs. Henry's farm. On the 29th, a little after 5 o'clock a. m., you ordered me to cross the turnpike, to deploy my division north of it, and to attack the forces of the enemy supposed to be concealed in the woods immediately in my front, my division forming the right wing of your army corps. * * * I pushed my left wing rapidly forward into the long stretch of woods before me, and found myself obliged to extend my line considerably in order to establish the connection with General Milroy, which, however, was soon effected.

Hardly had this been done when the fire commenced near the point where General Milroy's right touched my left. I placed the battery of the second brigade upon an elevation of ground, about 600 or 700 yards behind the point where that brigade had entered the woods a little to the left, so as to protect the retreat of the regiments composing the left wing, in case they should be forced to fall back. The battery of the first brigade remained for the same purpose on high ground behind the woods in which Colonel Schimmelfennig was engaged, covering my right. When the fire of the skirmishers had been going on a little while two prisoners were brought to me, sent by Colonel Schimmelfennig, who stated that there was a very large force of the enemy (Ewell's and Jackson's divisions) immediately in my front, and about the same time one of Colonel Schimmelfennig's aides informed me that heavy columns of troops were seen moving on my right flank, and that it could not be distinguished whether they were Union troops or rebels. I then withdrew the reserve regiment of the second brigade (the Fifty-fourth New York) from the woods, so as to have it at my disposal in an emergency, and ordered Colonel Schimmelfennig to form one of his regiments front toward the right and to send out skirmishers in that direction, so as to ascertain the true condition of things there.

Meanwhile the fire in front had extended along the whole line and become very lively, my regiments pushing the enemy vigorously before them about one-half mile. The discharges of musketry increased in rapidity and volume as we advanced, and it soon became evident that the enemy was throwing heavy masses against us. About that time General Steinwehr brought the Twenty-ninth New York, under Colonel Soest, to my support, and formed it in line of battle on the edge of the roads behind a fence. I then received information that the columns which had appeared on my right, and which really seemed to have belonged to the enemy, had disappeared again in the woods without making any demonstration, and also that General Kearny's troops were coming up in my rear. Thus reassured about the safety of my right, and expecting more serious business in the center, I sent the Fifty-fourth New York forward again, with the order to fill up the gap between my two brigades occasioned by the extension of my line toward General Milroy's right. The Twenty-ninth New York remained in reserve.

Immediately afterward the enemy began to press my center so severely that it gave way; but we soon rallied it again, and after a sharp contest reoccupied the ground previously taken from the enemy. It was about 10 o'clock a. m. when an officer announced to me that General Kearny had arrived on the battlefield and desired to see me. General Kearny requested me to shorten my front and condense my line by drawing my right nearer to the left, so as to make room for him on the right. I gave my orders to Colonel Schimmelfennig accordingly. A short time afterward I discovered that two small regiments sent to my support had slipped in between my two brigades, and were occupying part of my line in the woods. General Kearny was just moving up his troops on my right when the enemy made another furious charge upon my center. The two regiments above mentioned, as well as the Fifty-fourth New York, broke and were thrown out of the woods in disorder.

* * * * * * *

The Twenty-ninth New York and the Fifty-fourth New York had just re-entered the woods when one of your aides presented to me for perusal a letter which you had addressed to General Kearny, requesting him to attack at once with his whole force, as the rebel General Longstreet who was expected to re-enforce the enemy during the day had not yet arrived upon the battlefield, and we might hope to gain decisive advantage before his arrival. I then ordered a general advance of my whole line, which was executed with great gallantry, the enemy yielding everywhere before us.

* * * * * * *

Now the whole line advanced with great alacrity, and we succeeded in driving the enemy away from his strong position behind the embankment, which then fell into our hands on my left also.

While this was going on I heard from time to time very heavy firing on my left, where General Milroy stood. The sound of the musketry was swaying forward and backward, indicating that the fight was carried on with alternate success. The connection of my left with General Milroy's right was lost, and I found my left uncovered. However, we succeeded in holding the position of the railroad embankment along my whole front against the repeated attacks of the enemy until about 2 o'clock p. m., when my troops, who had started at 5 o'clock in the morning, mostly without breakfast, had been under fire for eight hours, had been decimated by enormous losses, and had exhausted nearly all their ammunition, were relieved by a number of regiments kindly sent by General Hooker for that purpose. These re-enforcements arrived in my front between 1 and 2 o'clock. According to your order, I withdrew my regiments, one after another, as their places were filled by those of General Hooker. Thus the possession of that portion of the woods which my division had taken and held was in good order delivered to the troops that relieved me. * * * Exhausted and worn down as my men were my division was unable to take part in the action after 2 o'clock p. m., nor was I called upon to do so.

HEADQUARTERS INDEPENDENT BRIGADE,
Near Fort Ethan Allen, Virginia, September 12, 1862.

On the following morning (the 29th), at daylight, I was ordered to proceed in search of the rebels, and had not proceeded more than 500 yards when we were greeted by a few straggling shots from the woods in front. We were now at the creek, and I had just sent forward my skirmishers, when I received orders to halt and let the men have breakfast. While they were cooking, myself, accompanied by General Schenck, rode up to the top of an eminence, some 500 yards to the front, to reconnoiter. We had no sooner reached the top than we were greeted by a shower of musket balls from the woods on our right. I immediately ordered up my battery and gave the bushwhackers a few shot and shell, which soon cleared the woods. Soon after I discovered the enemy in great force about three-quarters of a mile in front of us, upon our right of the pike leading from Gainesville to Alexandria. I brought up my two batteries and opened upon them, causing them to fall back. I then moved forward my brigade, with skirmishers deployed, and continued to advance my regiments, the enemy falling back.

General Schenck's division was off to my left and that of General Schurz to my right. After passing a piece of woods I turned to the right, where the rebels had a battery that gave us a great deal of trouble. I brought forward one of my batteries to reply to it, and soon after heard a tremendous fire of small-arms, and knew that General Schurz was hotly engaged to my right in an extensive forest. I sent two of my regiments, the Eighty-second Ohio, Colonel Cantwell, and the Fifth Virginia, Colonel Zeigler, to General Schurz's assistance. They were to attack the enemy's right flank, and I held my other two regiments in reserve for a time.

The two regiments sent to Shurz were soon hotly engaged, the enemy being behind a railroad embankment, which afforded them an excellent breastwork.

The railroad had to be approached from the cleared ground on our side through a strip of thick timber from 100 to 500 yards in width. I had intended, with the two regiments held in reserve (the Second and Third Virginia Regiments), to charge the rebel battery, which was but a short distance from us over the top of a hill to our left, but while making my arrangements to do this I observed that my two regiments engaged were being driven back out of the woods by the terrible fire of the rebels.

I then saw the brave Colonels Cantwell and Zeigler struggling to rally their broken regiments on the rear of the forest out of which they had been driven, and sent two of my aids to assist them and assure them of immediate support. They soon rallied their men and charged again and again up to the railroad, but were driven back each time with great loss. I then sent the Second Virginia to their support, directing it to approach the railroad at the point on the left of my other regiments, where the woods ended, but they were met by such a destructive fire from a large rebel force that they were soon thrown into confusion and fell back in disorder. The enemy now came on in overwhelming numbers. General Carl Schurz had been obliged to retire with his two brigades an hour before, and then the whole rebel force was turned against my brigade, and my brave lads were dashed back before the storm of bullets like chaff before the tempest. I then ordered my reserve battery into position a short distance in the rear, and when five guns had got into position one of the wheel horses was shot dead, but I ordered it to unlimber where they were, and the six guns mowed the rebels with grape and canister with fine effect.

My reserved regiment, the Third Virginia, now opened with telling effect. Colonel Cantwell, of the Eighty-second Ohio, was shot through the brain and instantly killed while trying to rally his regiment during the thickest of the fight.

While the storm was raging the fiercest, General Stahel came to me and reported that he had been sent by General Schenck to support me, and inquired where he should place his brigade. I told him on my left, and help support my battery. He then returned to his brigade, and soon after being attacked from another quarter, I did not again see him during the day. I was left wholly unsupported, except by a portion of a Pennsylvania regiment, which I found on the field, and stood by me bravely during the next hour or two. I then rallied my reserved regiment and broken fragments in the woods near my battery, and sent out a strong party of skirmishers to keep the enemy at bay, while another party went forward without arms to get off as many of our dead and wounded as possible. I maintained my ground, skirmishing, and occasionally firing by battalion during the greater part of the afternoon.

Toward evening General Grover came up with his New England brigade. I saw him forming a line to attack the rebel stronghold in the same place I had been all day, and advised him to form line more to the left, and charge bayonets on arriving at the railroad track, which his brigade executed with such telling effect as to drive the rebels in clouds before their bayonets. Meanwhile I had gathered the remnant of my brigade, ready to take advantage of any opportunity to assist him. I soon discovered a large number of rebels fleeing before the left flank of Grover's brigade. They passed over an open space some 500 yards in width in front of my reserved regiment, which I ordered to fire on them, which they did, accelerating their speed and discomfiture so much that I ordered a charge. My regiment immediately dashed out of the woods we were in down across the meadows in front of us after the retreating foe, but before their arriving at the other side of the meadow the retreating column received a heavy support from the railroad below them, and, soon rallying, came surging back, driving before their immense columns Grover's brigade and my handful of men.

An hour before the charge I had sent one of my aids back after a fresh battery—the ammunition of both my batteries having given out—which arriving as our boys were being driven back I immediately ordered them into position and commenced pouring a steady fire of grape and canister into the advancing columns of the enemy. The first discharge discomposed them a little, but the immense surging mass behind pressed them on us. I held on until they were within 100 yards of us, and having but a handful of men to support the battery, ordered it to retire, which was executed with the loss of one gun. I then rallied the shattered remnant of my brigade, which had been rallied by my aids and its officers, and encamped some three-quarters of a mile to the rear.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 6, 1862.

Early in the morning of the 29th General Sigel, who had come up the night before from near Manassas, and who was on Reynold's right, made demonstrations against the enemy, who seemed to be on the north of us. I directed Reynolds to support General Sigel on the left in the movements he might make, and then proceeded to join Generals King's and Ricketts's divisions.

At Manassas I found Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter's corps coming up, and soon after, in answer partly to a message of mine, I received your order of the 29th from Centreville, addressed jointly to General Porter and myself. In compliance with it, King's and Ricketts's divisions were directed, as soon as they could be placed on the road from Manassas Junction to Gainesville, which runs nearly west, to follow in the rear and close to General Porter's corps. Both these divisions had been on foot night and day for several days past, had marched the most of the night before, and were separated from their baggage and subsistence. They moved forward, however, cheerfully. The column coming to a halt, I rode forward and found General Porter at the head of his corps, on a slight eminence; in front was an open piece of ground, and beyond it the woods skirting the Warrenton road, down which, as we could see from the dust above the trees, the enemy was moving from Gainesville upon Groveton, where the battle was now going on.

Just before reaching General Porter I received a note from General Buford, commanding cavalry brigade, who was on our then left and front, acquainting me with the strength of the enemy, which he had seen as they passed through Gainesville, then moving down the road. It consisted of seventeen regiments, one battery, and five hundred cavalry. As this was an inferior force to General Porter's, I decided for him to throw himself at once on the enemy's flank, and as the head of my column was some 3 miles back, near the Sudley Springs road, I would move it directly north on that road upon the field where the battle was then at its height,

Generals Seymour and Jackson led their brigades in advance, but notwithstanding all the steadiness and courage of the men they were compelled, by the fire of the enemy's artillery and infantry on their front and left, to resume their former position.

Immediately on my arrival with King's division I directed it to move forward and take place on the left of Reynolds's, then still engaged on the left of Sigel's corps, and some of the brigades went forward to do so, when I received your instructions to order the division over to the north of the turnpike to support the line held by Reno, which had been hotly engaged all day, and the division was recalled and brought back to the Sudley Springs road for this purpose.

One of the brigades—Patrick's—having received an order, as he informed me, direct from your headquarters, to move across the field, became separated from the division, and though he moved at the quickest pace, was not able to rejoin until late that evening.

About the time the division arrived at the crossing of the Sudley Springs and Warrenton turnpike I received word from you that the enemy were falling back, and to send the division right up the turnpike after them. It was now near dusk, and though the men had been on foot since 1 o'clock in the morning they moved forward with the greatest enthusiasm. They were led gallantly up the road by Brigadier-General Hatch, who, trusting to find the enemy in retreat as he was told, and hoping to turn their retreat into a flight, took the men forward, his own and Doubleday's brigades and Gerrish's battery of howitzers, with Patrick's brigade in reserve, with an impetuosity akin to rashness. The attack was severe, both on the enemy and our men.

About the same time an attack was made by Bayard's cavalry, on the left of Hatch, on the enemy south of the road, in which Seymour's squadron suffered severely. These were the finishing strokes of the day, which we could now safely claim as ours. (Pages 337, 338, and 339.)

CAMP NEAR FREDERICK, MD., September 13, 1862.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to submit the following report of the movements of the first division, Third Corps, temporarily under my command during parts of the 29th and 30th days of August:

Late on the afternoon of the 29th ultimo I was ordered by General McDowell in person (who was at the time stationed near the stone house on the turnpike from Gainesville to Centreville) to move the division on the Gainesville road in pursuit of the enemy, who, he informed me, were retreating. Gibbon's brigade had been detached to support some batteries. With the three other brigades of the division and Gerrish's battery of howitzers, I proceeded with all the speed possible, hoping, by harassing the enemy's rear, to turn their retreat into a rout.

After marching about three-quarters of a mile the Second Regiment of United States Sharpshooters was deployed to the front as skirmishers, the column continuing up the road in support. The advance almost immediately became warmly engaged on the left of the road. Two howitzers were then placed in position, one on each side of the road, and Doubleday's brigade was deployed to the front, on the left of the road, and moved up to the support of the skirmishers. We were met by a force consisting of three brigades of infantry, one of which was posted in the woods on the left, parallel to and about an eighth of a mile from the road. The two other brigades were drawn up in line of battle, one on each side of the road. These were in turn supported by a large portion of the rebel forces, estimated by a prisoner, who was taken to their rear, at about thirty thousand men, drawn up in successive lines, extending 1½ miles to the rear. Doubleday's brigade moved to the front under a very heavy fire, which they gallantly sustained; but the firing continuing very heavy, Hatch's brigade, commanded by Colonel Sullivan, was also deployed, and moved to the support of General Doubleday. Patrick's brigade, which had been held in reserve, took up a position on the opposite side of the road, completely commanding it. The struggle, lasting some three-quarters of an hour, was a desperate one, being in many instances a hand-to-hand conflict.

Night had now come on, our loss had been severe, and the enemy occupying a position in the woods on our left which gave them a flank fire upon us, I was forced to give the order for a retreat. The retreat was executed in good order, the attempt of the enemy to follow being defeated by a few well-directed volleys from Patrick's brigade. (Page 367.)

* * * * * * *

At 1 a. m. on the 29th the division moved on the road to Manassas Junction, by order of General King, reaching the Junction at 7 a. m., having made a march of about 8 miles. After a short rest, which scarcely availed to refresh our weary and battle-worn soldiers, my brigade, together with the rest of the division, returned on the Centreville road again to a point about a mile east of the battlefield of the night before.

Here Jackson's army was drawn up to dispute the passage to Washington. King's division was posted on the left of General McDowell's line of battle. We remained in this position for two or three hours, when an order came for Hatch's and my brigades to attack the enemy's right, it being represented that his whole line was in great confusion, and that it was only necessary for us to move forward to render his rout complete and capture a large number of fugitives. Under this impression we advanced to the attack at the double-quick step, my brigade leading the way, accompanied by Captain Gerrish's battery. As we gained the crest of a hill the battery opened on the enemy, but without much effect, owing to their being well sheltered.

I have learned subsequently, from prisoners taken in the action, that we did not encounter Jackson's force at all. It was Longstreet's division, which had just come up, after having been delayed on its route from Thoroughfare Gap by General Ricketts's command. Drawn up in three ranks, the front rank kneeling, the rebels poured in an incessant fire, their line not only confronting ours, but enveloping us on each flank. As their brigades came up one after another, while we received no re-enforcement, the contest soon became very unequal, and after reforming several times we were obliged to fall back, the enemy following, until checked by a daring charge of the Harris Light Cavalry, which ended the contest for the night. At the dawn of the next morning (the 29th) we were again upon the road to Manassas, where we arrived before noon, and unexpectedly found it in the possession of our army. After two or three hours' rest the line of march was taken for another battlefield, the battle then raging with great fury near the old Bull Run battle-ground. At the close of the day we arrived upon the ground, the battle still in progress, the rebels being strongly pressed and yielding ground. The regiment, in connection with those composing the brigade, bivouacked on the field while the balls and shells of the enemy were still flying over and around them.

CAMP NEAR MUNSON'S HILL, VA., September 5, 1862.

I then returned to my own division, which I reached at daylight on the morning of the 28th [29th]; closed up with General Sigel's command on the old battlefield of Bull Run. General Sigel reported the enemy in his immediate front, and requested my co-operation with him in an attack upon his position. I accordingly formed my division on the left of General Sigel's corps, next to the division of General Schenck. General McDowell joined the command at daylight, and directed my co-operation with General Sigel.

The right of the enemy's position could be discerned upon the heights above Groveton, on the right of the pike. The division advanced over the ground to the heights above Groveton, crossed the pike, and Cooper's battery came gallantly into action on the same ridge on which the enemy's right was, supported by Meade's brigade. While pressing forward our extreme left across the pike, re-enforcements were sent for by General Sigel for the right of his line, under General Milroy, now hardly pressed by the enemy, and a brigade was taken from Schenck's command on my right. The whole fire of the enemy was now concentrated on the extreme right of my division, and, unsupported there, the battery was obliged to retire, with considerable loss in both men and horses, and the division fell back to connect with Schenck.

Later in the day General Pope, arriving on the right from Centreville, renewed the attack on the enemy and drove him some distance. My division was directed to threaten the enemy's right and rear, which it proceeded to do under a heavy fire of artillery from the ridge to the left of the pike. Generals Seymour and Jackson led their brigades in advance, but notwithstanding all the steadiness and courage shown by the men they were compelled to fall back before the heavy fire of artillery and musketry which met them both on the front and left flank, and the division resumed its original position. King's division engaged the enemy along the pike on our right, and the action was continued with it until dark by Meade's brigade. (Pages 393 and 394.)

HEADQUARTERS FIRST BRIGADE, REYNOLDS'S DIVISION, P. R. V. C.,
Camp near Munson's Hill, Va., September 5, 1862.

CAPTAIN: I have to submit the following report of the operations of my command since leaving Fredericksburg on the night of August 21:

* * * * * * *

On the 29th the brigade was formed in line of battle on the left of Sigel's corps and directed to move on Gainesville. Sigel, having found the enemy on his front on the other side of the Warrenton pike, engaged them along his whole line, and the brigade moved up on his left until it crossed the Warrenton pike within a half mile of Groveton, at which point Cooper's battery was established on the ridge, with the Fourth, Seventh, and Eighth regiments to support him, the Third being posted along the pike and the Rifles sent up the pike as skirmishers.

The enemy, perceiving this disposition, brought several batteries to bear on Cooper's, who, being short of ammunition, was withdrawn, and Ransom's was about being substituted, when it was ascertained that Schenck's division of Sigel's corps, which had been on our right, was withdrawn, and at the same time the enemy's infantry were deploying in our front in such force as required the withdrawal of the brigade to the other side of the Warrenton pike, where a position was taken on the plateau near what is known as the Lewis House, which overlooks Groveton and the pike leading to it. This position was held until dark, when, ascertaining that the attack of a portion of King's division, on our right and front, had been repulsed and the enemy advancing in force, I directed the withdrawal of the batteries, and after dark withdrew the brigade to the position occupied by the rest of the division.

On the morning of the 30th the brigade advanced. (Pages 397 and 398.)

Arlington, Va., October 21, 1862.

At 10 a. m. I reached the field of battle, a mile from stone bridge, on the Warrenton turnpike. General Kearny's division had proceeded to the right and front. I learned that General Sigel was in command of the troops then engaged and called on him.

At 11 a. m. the head of Hooker's division arrived; General Reno an hour later. At the request of General Sigel I ordered General Hooker to place one of his brigades at General Sigel's disposal to re-enforce a portion of his line then hard pressed. General Grover reported, and before long became engaged, and was afterward supported by the whole division. General Pope arrived between 1 and 2 p. m. The enemy were driven back a short distance toward Sudley church, where they made another stand, and again pressed a portion of our line back. All this time General Kearny's division held its position on our extreme right. Several orders were sent to him to advance, but he did not move until after the troops on his left had been forced back, which was near 6 p. m. He now advanced and reported that he was driving the enemy. This was not, however, until after the renewed heavy musketry fire on our center had driven General Hooker's troops and those he was sent to support back. They were greatly outnumbered, and had behaved with exceeding gallantry.

It was on this occasion that General Grover's brigade made the most gallant and determined bayonet charge of the war. He broke two of the enemy's lines, but was finally repulsed by the overwhelming numbers in the rebel third line. It was a hand-to-hand conflict, using the bayonet and the butt of the musket. In this fierce encounter, of not over twenty minutes' duration, the Second New Hampshire, Colonel Marston, suffered the most. The First, Eleventh, and Sixteenth Massachusetts and Twenty-sixth Pennsylvania were engaged. The loss of this brigade, numbering less than two thousand present, was a total of four hundred and eighty-four, nearly all killed and wounded. I refer you to General Grover's accompanying report.

Had General Kearny pushed the enemy earlier, it might have enabled us to have held our center and have saved some of this heavy loss. Kearny on the right, with General Stevens and our artillery, drove the enemy out of the woods they had temporarily occupied. The firing continued until some time after dark, and when it ceased we remained in possession of the battlefield. During the night, however, our troops again fell back from the woods that had been so obstinately disputed all the afternoon. (Pages 412, 413.)

HDQRS. FIRST DIVISION, THIRD CORPS, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
Centreville, Va., August 31, 1862.

COLONEL: I report the part taken by my division in the battles of the two previous days. On the 29th, on my arrival, I was assigned to the holding of the right wing, my left on Leesburg road. I posted Colonel Poe, with Berry's brigade, in first line, General Robinson, first brigade, on his right, partly in line and partly in support, and kept Birney's most disciplined regiments reserved and ready for emergencies. Toward noon I was obliged to occupy a quarter of a mile additional on left of said road, from Schurz's troops being taken elsewhere.

During the first hours of combat General Birney, on tired regiments in the center falling back, of his own accord rapidly pushed across to give them a hand to raise themselves to a renewed fight. In early afternoon General Pope's order, per General Roberts, was to send a pretty strong force diagonally to the front to relieve the center in the woods from pressure. Accordingly I detached for that purpose General Robinson, with his brigade; the Sixty-third Pennsylvania Volunteers, Colonel Hays; the One hundred and fifth Pennsylvania Volunteers, Captain Craig; the Twentieth Indiana, Colonel Brown, and, additionally, the Third Michigan Marksmen, under Colonel Champlin.

General Robinson drove forward for several hundred yards, but the center of the main battle being shortly after driven back and out of the woods, my detachment, thus exposed, so considerably in front of all others, both flanks in air, was obliged to cease to advance, and confine themselves to holding their own. At 5 o'clock, thinking—though at the risk of exposing my fighting line to being enfiladed—that I might drive the enemy by an unexpected attack through the woods, I brought up additionally the most of Birney's regiments—the Fourth Maine, Colonel Walker and Lieutenant-Colonel Carver; the Fortieth New York, Colonel Egan; First New York, Major Burt, and One hundred and first New York, Lieutenant-Colonel Gesner—and changed front to the left, to sweep with a rush the first line of the enemy. This was most successful. The enemy rolled up on his own right. It presaged a victory for us all. Still our force was too light. The enemy brought up rapidly heavy reserves, so that our farther progress was impeded. General Stevens came up gallantly in action to support us, but did not have the numbers. (Pages 415, 416.)

HEADQUARTERS ROBINSON'S BRIGADE,
Centreville, Va., August 31, 1862.

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to submit the following report of the operations of my brigade yesterday and day before:

On Friday morning I was ordered to support Colonel Poe's brigade and to develop his line of battle to the right. After crossing Bull Run I moved forward in two lines—the first composed of the Twentieth Indiana and One hundred and fifth Pennsylvania, and the second of the Sixty-third Pennsylvania and five companies of the Thirtieth Ohio, which were temporarily attached to my command.

Arriving on the ground assigned me, I remained for a considerable time exposed to a heavy artillery fire, after which I took up my position on high ground farther to the right. I was soon after directed by Major-General Kearny, commanding division, to move to the support of Poe's left, when I formed the Sixty-third and One hundred and fifth Pennsylvania in line of battle on the Leesburg road, holding the Twentieth Indiana and Ohio battalion in reserve. At this time there was a heavy musketry fire to our left and front, and I was directed to move forward through the woods to turn the enemy and cut off his retreat through the railroad cut. On arriving on the ground with the Sixty-third and One hundred and fifth Pennsylvania, Twentieth Indiana, and Third Michigan, I found the railroad already occupied by our own troops and the cornfield in front filled with the enemy. I then deployed the Sixty-third and One hundred and fifth Pennsylvania along the railroad to the right of the troops in position, directing the Third Michigan to protect my right flank, placing the Twentieth Indiana in reserve, and throwing skirmishers to the front.

Soon after taking this position the regiments on my left gave way and passed rapidly to the rear out of the woods, leaving my left flank entirely exposed. As rapidly as possible I moved my command to the left to occupy the deserted ground, but before my troops could get fairly into position I was fiercely attacked by a superior force that had succeeded in crossing the road. I then threw forward my right wing, forming my line of battle at right angles to the original position, and checked the progress of the enemy. At this time General Birney brought up and turned over to me his Fourth Maine. He afterward sent me his First, Fortieth, and One hundred and first New York Regiments. These troops were deployed to the right and left of the railroad, and pushed forward to the support of my regiments in front, which were suffering severely from a terrific fire of musketry and the enemy's artillery, posted on a hill to our right and rear. Our men now gained steadily on the enemy, and were driving him before them until he brought up fresh masses of troops (supposed to be two brigades), when, with ammunition nearly expended, we withdrew to our second position. (Pages 421, 422.)

[Report of Brig. Gen. Cuvier Grover, United States Army, commanding first brigade, of engagement at Kettle Run and battles of Groveton and Bull Run.]

On the following day we recontinued our march for the plains of Manassas by the way of Centreville, and arrived upon the battlefield about 9 a. m. The battle had already commenced, and as my column moved to the front the shells fell with remarkable precision along the line of the road, but fortunately did no damage. My brigade was temporarily placed under the orders of Major-General Sigel, whose troops were then engaging the enemy in the center. Under instructions received from him I threw forward the First Massachusetts Volunteers to support his line, while my remaining four regiments were drawn up in two lines, sheltered from the enemy's fire by a roll of the field in front. This position was occupied until about 2.30 p. m.

In the mean time I rode over the field in front as far as the position of the enemy would admit. After rising the hill under which my command lay an open field was entered, and from one edge of it gradually fell off in a slope to a valley, through which ran a railroad embankment. Beyond this embankment the forest continued, and the corresponding heights beyond were held by the enemy in force, supported by artillery.

At 3 p. m. I received an order to advance in line of battle over this ground, pass the embankment, enter the edge of the woods beyond, and hold it. Dispositions for carrying out such orders were immediately made. Pieces were loaded, bayonets fixed, and instructions given for the line to move slowly upon the enemy until it felt his fire, then close upon him rapidly, fire one well-directed volley, and rely upon the bayonet to secure the position on the other side.

We rapidly and firmly pressed upon the embankment, and here occurred a short, sharp, and obstinate hand-to-hand conflict with bayonets and clubbed muskets. Many of the enemy were bayoneted in their tracks, others struck down with the buts of pieces, and onward pressed our line. In a few yards more it met a terrible fire from a second line, which in its turn broke. The enemy's third line now bore down upon our thinned ranks in close order, and swept back the right center and a portion of our left. With the gallant Sixteenth Massachusetts on our left I tried to turn his flank, but the breaking of our right and center and the weight of the enemy's lines caused the necessity of falling back, first to the embankment and then to our first position, behind which we rallied to our colors.

In this fierce encounter of not more than twenty minutes' duration our loss was as follows:

Command.	Killed.	Wounded.	Missing.	Total.
First Massachusetts Volunteers	5	66	7	78
Second New Hampshire Volunteers	16	87	30	133
Eleventh Massachusetts Volunteers	10	77	25	112
Sixteenth Massachusetts Volunteers	4	64	42	110
Twenty-sixth Pennsylvania Volunteers	6	33	14	53
	41	327	118	486

Though forced to retire from the field by the immensely superior numbers of the enemy, supported by artillery and by the natural strength of his position, men never fought more gallantly or efficiently. (Pages 438, 439.)

CAPTAIN: I have the honor to submit the following report of the movements and services rendered by the brigade from the 26th ultimo to the 3d instant inclusive:

* * * * * * *

The next morning (29th) the march was resumed, passing through Centreville. We arrived on the battle-ground about 2 p. m.

* * * * * * *

Having everything in readiness I gave the order to advance. The line had advanced but a few steps when the left was struck with such violence by a regiment (which continued the line to the left) which had broken, that the Second Excelsior Regiment, which was on the left of the brigade line, was almost carried away with it. Seeing the confusion, I rode hastily to this part of the line, accompanied by my two aids, Lieutenants Tremain and Dwight, and endeavored to stay this disgraceful retreat, but it was in vain; the tide could not be stemmed.

On they rushed over and through my line perfectly panic-stricken, breaking and carrying away with them the left of my line. The enemy seeing this charged after them. I then endeavored to throw back my line to give the enemy a flank fire. This I found on trial impracticable, the wood being too dense to execute the movement. By this time the enemy had availed themselves of the large interval opened on my left and poured through in large numbers, and had got 50 or 60 paces in my rear, giving the line an enfilading and reverse fire. They, however, soon ceased firing, as they were so mixed up as to endanger their own men; they then commenced taking prisoners. Finding my line completely flanked and turned, and in danger of being entirely cut off, I gave the order to fall back, which was done in as good order as could be, situated as we were. The loss on this occasion was not as large as I had reason to apprehend, yet it was considerable. (Pages 444 and 445.)

HOOKER'S DIV. (SECOND), THIRD ARMY CORPS,
Camp near Fort Lyon, Virginia, September 4, 1862.

LIEUTENANT: In compliance with orders from brigade headquarters I have the honor to report the part taken by this regiment in the recent battles at Bristoe Station, on the 27th, and Bull Run, on Friday and Saturday, August 29 and 30:

* * * * * * *

Left Union Mills August 29, at 3 a. m., reaching Centreville before 9 a. m., when we ascertained the enemy had made a stand beyond Bull Run. Our division was early ordered forward, reaching the field about noon. The first and third brigades were engaged first, the Excelsior (second) being held in reserve. Twice our position was changed, soon bringing us within supporting distance. The battle raged fearfully, the enemy making a desperate stand, never flinching. His artillery worked splendidly, exerting us to hold him in check. It soon became necessary to forward our brigade. Forming in line of battle facing a long wood, the Third Regiment on the extreme right, this command directly on their left and on the right of the other regiments of the brigade, with three regiments numbering twenty-four hundred strong immediately on the left of our brigade, we moved cautiously and steadily into the wood to relieve a force already engaging the enemy, who was behind and holding a railway.

We had barely time to reach the point designated when the rebels, with a murderous shout, accompanied by a sharp fire, broke through the brigade in front, forcing them pell-mell on our line of battle, at the same time skillfully turning our left flank and routing the brigade on our left from the wood, our men never wavering until Colonel Taylor saw it would be madness to expose his command to the mercies of a desperate and much larger foe. As it was, we held our ground until many of our mounted officers were dragged from their horses and our colors within the enemy's grasp. Still undaunted, Colonel Taylor rallied his little force at the edge of the wood that he might send skirmishers back to protect the recovery of our wounded comrades, never leaving the field until the skirmishers had been twice driven in and orders arrived from General Hooker for us to retire. We passed the night on the top of a hill in the rear of a reserve battery. (Pages 446 and 447.)

HEADQUARTERS THIRD REGIMENT,
Camp near Spring Hill, September 7, 1862.

I have the honor to report that the Third Excelsior, of your brigade, under my command, on the 29th of August took the position assigned on the right of the brigade line, and advanced into the timber, where a portion of our forces were already engaged with the enemy. My instructions were to halt behind the line engaged, and when their ammunition was exhausted take their place. I advanced skirmishers covering my whole front to this line and dressed my regiment accurately on the brigade line. Our position was hardly taken when the line of troops in our front, belonging to regiments never before under fire, gave way under a dashing attempt of the enemy to turn the left of our line. Gradually the left gave way, struggling hand-to-hand for life and their colors, until the line was broken up to the left of my command, rendered almost powerless by the influence and presence of the disorganized troops breaking through my line and preventing my firing until the enemy were actually in our ranks in overpowering numbers. We fell back 300 yards to the edge of the timber and again formed line and advanced skirmishers forward to the line we had just left. The enemy had also fallen back, and seemed unwilling to improve his temporary advantage. By order I again withdrew my skirmishers and subsequently took position for the night with the brigade. At 2 o'clock Friday morning, August 29, I received orders to march at 3 a. m. and support General Kearny, who was in pursuit of the enemy. A march of 10 miles brought us to the Bull Run battlefield. About 11 a. m. was ordered into position to support a battery in front of the woods, where the enemy was engaged with General Sigel's troops. Remaining about one hour in that position, was ordered to send into the woods and relieve two regiments of General Sigel's corps. I sent in the Sixth and Seventh New Jersey Volunteers. Afterward received orders to take the balance of the brigade into the woods, which I did at about 2 p. m. Here I at once engaged the enemy and fought him for a space of two hours, holding my position until our ammunition was all expended. About 4 o'clock we were relieved by General Reno and Colonel Taylor, but did not reach the skirt of the woods before a retreat was made and the woods occupied by the enemy. When I arrived out of the woods I was ordered to march about half a mile to the rear and bivouac for the night. (Pages 454, 455.)

HEADQUARTERS FIFTH NEW JERSEY VOLUNTEERS,
Camp near Alexandria, Va., September 5, 1862.

* * * * * * *

SIR: I have the honor to make the following report of the part taken by the regiment under my command at the battle of Bull Run [Groveton], August 29:

I received orders to deploy my right wing as skirmishers in front of the brigade in an open wood. As soon as the line advanced to where the line of another division had previously been, firing commenced on both sides, continuing up to the time that the brigade was relieved. I was soon obliged to relieve my right with my left wing, the former having emptied their cartridge-boxes, containing sixty rounds. The men thus relieved I posted in the rear of the line of battle to prevent stragglers from leaving the fight. The brigade having been relieved by General Reno's brigade while I was forming the regiment, this last brigade fell back in disorder. I endeavored to stop them, but finding that the enemy were almost up to my line, deployed in the rear, and now being formed, having divided their cartridges equally, I saw that it was time for me to take care of my own command.

A part of the Eighth New Jersey, with their colors, formed on my left. The enemy having turned the left flank of the line of battle, came out in the open field on my left, and immediately after I received their fire from the front, which I returned, driving them from our immediate vicinity, and then marched to position on the right of the first line of the brigade, my left resting on the railroad. Advancing in this manner, I was soon entangled in a dense wood, which retarded my progress, it being almost impassable. I was obliged to halt several times and form the regiment. Skirmishers in advance reporting the enemy in my immediate vicinity, the Second New York and One hundred and fifteenth Pennsylvania, on my left, soon became engaged. Finding it impossible to push my way through the woods in anything like order, I threw one company to the left of the railroad an ' one across the track. Three companies immediately opened a flank fire on the enemy, who were using the high embankment of the railroad as a breastwork. After a few volleys the enemy gave way, when I ordered a charge up the railroad. The regiment advanced on the double-quick, the enemy running before us.

At this point I took one prisoner, who was not able to keep up with his comrades. Halting in an open field, on the brow of a hill, the enemy in sight on my left and front, the regiment rested until the rest of the brigade came up. The infantry did not again become engaged.

Later in the day I was ordered to picket a road 2 miles to the left. While performing this duty the regiment captured twenty-three prisoners.

* * * * * * *

In this engagement the officers and men of the regiment, without any exceptions, behaved with great gallantry. All seemed to be actuated with the same spirit, and that was to fight.

[Report of General R. E. Lee, C. S. A.]

JUNE 8, 1863.

Generals Jones and Wilcox bivouacked that night east of the mountain, and on the morning of the 29th the whole command resumed the march, the sound of cannon at Manassas announcing that Jackson was already engaged. Longstreet entered the turnpike near Gainesville, and moving down toward Groveton, the head of his column came upon the field in rear of the enemy's left, which had already opened with artillery upon Jackson's right, as previously described. He immediately placed some of his batteries in position, but before he could complete his dispositions to attack the enemy withdrew, not, however, without loss from our artillery. Longstreet took position on the right of Jackson, Hood's two brigades, supported by Evans, being deployed across the turnpike and at right angles to it. These troops were supported on the left by three brigades under General Wilcox and by a like force on the right under General Kemper. D. R. Jones's division formed the extreme right of the line, resting on the Manassas Gap Railroad. The cavalry guarded our right and left flanks, that on the right being under General Stuart in person.

After the arrival of Longstreet the enemy changed his position and began to concentrate opposite Jackson's left, opening a brisk artillery fire, which was responded to with effect by some of General A. P. Hill's batteries. Colonel Walton placed a part of his artillery upon a commanding position between the lines of Generals Jackson and Longstreet by order of the latter and engaged the enemy vigorously for several hours. Soon afterward General Stuart reported the approach of a large force from the direction of Bristoe Station, threatening Longstreet's right. The brigades under General Wilcox were sent to re-enforce General Jones, but no serious attack was made, and after firing a few shots the enemy withdrew. While this demonstration was being made on our right a large force advanced to assail the left of Jackson's position, occupied by the division of General A. P. Hill. The attack was received by his troops with their accustomed steadiness and the battle raged with great fury. The enemy was repeatedly repulsed, but again pressed on to the attack with fresh troops. Once he succeeded in penetrating an interval between General Gregg's brigade, on the extreme left, and that of General Thomas, but was quickly driven back with great slaughter by the Fourteenth South Carolina Regiment, then in reserve, and the Forty-ninth Georgia, of Thomas's brigade.

The contest was close and obstinate, the combatants sometimes delivering their fire at ten paces. General Gregg, who was most exposed, was re-enforced by Hays's brigade, under Colonel Forno, and successfully and gallantly resisted the attacks of the enemy until, the ammunition of his brigade being exhausted and all his field officers but two killed or wounded, it was relieved, after several hours of severe fighting, by Early's brigade and the Eighth Louisiana Regiment. General Early drove the enemy back with heavy loss, and pursued about 200 yards beyond the line of battle, when he was recalled to the position on the railroad where Thomas, Pender, and Archer had firmly held their ground against every attack. While the battle was raging on Jackson's left General Longstreet ordered Hood and Evans to advance, but before the order could be obeyed Hood was himself attacked, and his command at once became warmly engaged. General Wilcox was recalled from the right and ordered to advance on Hood's left, and one of Kemper's brigades, under Colonel Hunton, moved forward on his right. The enemy was repulsed by Hood after a severe contest and fell back, closely followed by our troops.

The battle continued until 9 p. m., the enemy retreating until he reached a strong position, which he held with a large force. The darkness of the night put a stop to the engagement, and our troops remained in their advanced position until early next morning, when they were withdrawn to their first line. One piece of artillery, several stands of colors, and a number of prisoners were captured.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF NORTHEASTERN VIRGINIA,
Chantilly, Va., September 3, 1862.

Mr. PRESIDENT: My letter of the 30th ultimo will have informed your excellency of the progress of this army to that date. General Longstreet's division, having arrived the day previous, was formed in order of battle on the right of General Jackson, who had been engaged with the enemy since morning resisting an attack commenced on the 28th. The enemy on the latter day was vigorously repulsed, leaving his numerous dead and wounded on the field. His attack on the morning of the 29th was feeble, but became warmer in the afternoon, when he was again repulsed by both wings of the army, his loss on this day, as stated in his published report, herewith inclosed, amounting to eight thousand killed and wounded. (Page 559.)

HEADQUARTERS, NEAR WINCHESTER, VA., October 10, 1862.

GENERAL: I have the honor to submit the following report of the operations of my command in the late campaign:

* * * * * * *

Early on the 29th the columns were united and the advance to join General Jackson was resumed. The noise of battle was heard before we reached Gainesville. The march was quickened to the extent of our capacity. The excitement of battle seemed to give new life and strength to our jaded men, and the head of my column soon reached a position in rear of the enemy's left flank and within easy cannon-shot. On approaching the field some of Brigadier-General Hood's batteries were ordered into position, and his division was deployed on the right and left of the turnpike at right angles with it, and supported by Brigadier-General Evans's brigade. Before these batteries could open the enemy discovered our movements and withdrew his left. Another battery (Captain Stribling's) was placed upon a commanding position to my right, which played upon the rear of the enemy's left and drove him entirely from that part of the field. He changed his front rapidly, so as to meet the advance of Hood and Evans. Three brigades, under General Wilcox, were thrown forward to the support of the left, and three others, under General Kemper, to the support of the right, of these commands.

General D. R. Jones's division was placed upon the Manassas Gap Railroad to the right and en échelon with regard to the three last brigades. Colonel Walton placed his batteries in a commanding position between my line and that of General Jackson, and engaged the enemy for several hours in a severe and successful artillery duel. At a late hour in the day Major-General Stuart reported the approach of the enemy in heavy columns against my extreme right. I withdrew General Wilcox, with his three brigades, from the left and placed his command in position to support Jones in case of an attack against my right. After some few shots the enemy withdrew his forces, moving them around toward his front, and about 4 o'clock in the afternoon began to press forward against General Jackson's position. Wilcox's brigades were moved back to their former position, and Hood's two brigades, supported by Evans, were quickly pressed forward to the attack. At the same time Wilcox's three brigades made a like advance, as also Hunton's brigade, of Kemper's command. These movements were executed with commendable zeal and ability.

Hood, supported by Evans, made a gallant attack, driving the enemy back until 9 o'clock at night. One piece of artillery, several regimental standards, and a number of prisoners were taken. The enemy's entire force was found to be massed directly in my front, and in so strong a position that it was not deemed advisable to move on against his immediate front; so the troops were quietly withdrawn at 1 o'clock the following morning. The wheels of the captured piece were cut down and it was left on the ground.

The enemy seized that opportunity to claim a victory, and the Federal commander was so imprudent as to dispatch his Government by telegraph tidings to that effect. After withdrawing from the attack my troops were placed in the line first occupied and in the original order. (Pages 564, 565.)

RICHMOND, VA., December 8, 1862.

MAJOR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the movements of my division and of the part it performed in the engagements of the campaign in Northern Virginia and Maryland. Serious illness and absence from the field has delayed its appearance till now.

* * * * * * *

Crossing the Rappahannock River, I reached Thoroughfare Gap on the 28th, and under orders from General Longstreet sent forward the Ninth Georgia Regiment, Anderson's brigade, into the Gap, following it with my whole division.

* * * * * * *

Appearances indicating his retreat, I advanced my command and bivouacked beyond the Gap unmolested by the enemy. The intense darkness and ignorance of the fords over the creek in my front prevented pursuit.

* * * * * * *

Early on the morning of the 29th I took up the line of march in the direction of the old battle-ground of Manassas, whence heavy firing was heard. Arriving on the ground about noon, my command was stationed on the extreme right of our whole line, and during the balance of the day was subjected to shelling, resulting in but few casualties.

On the morning of the 30th slight alterations were made in the disposition of my command, throwing it more forward and to the right, the battle meanwhile raging fiercely on the left. (Page 579.)

HEADQUARTERS ANDERSON'S DIVISION,
October 11, 1862.

Early the following morning our march was resumed, and the command rejoined at 9.30 a. m. the remainder of the division at the intersection of the two roads leading from the gaps above mentioned. Pursuing our line of march, together with the division, we passed by Gainesville, and advancing some 3 miles beyond, my three brigades were formed in line of battle on the left and at right angles to the turnpike. Having advanced near three-fourths of a mile, we were then halted. The enemy was in our front and not far distant. Several of our batteries were placed in position on a commanding eminence to the left of the turnpike. A cannonading ensued and continued for an hour or two, to which the enemy's artillery replied.

At 4.30 or 5 p. m. the three brigades were moved across to the right of the turnpike a mile or more to the Manassas Gap Railroad. While here musketry was heard to our left on the turnpike. This firing continued with more or less vivacity till sundown. Now the command was ordered back to the turnpike and forward on this to the support of General Hood, who had become engaged with the enemy and had driven him back some distance, inflicting severe loss upon him, being checked in his successes by the darkness of the night. After reaching General Hood's position but little musketry was heard; all soon became quiet. Our pickets were thrown out to the front. The enemy's camp fires soon became visible, extending far off to our left, front, and right. Remaining in this position till 12 o'clock at night, the troops were withdrawn three-fourths of a mile to the rear and bivouacked, pickets being left to guard our front. (Page 598.)

DIVISION HEADQUARTERS, September 27, 1862.

After a spirited little engagemedt with them by General D. R. Jones's troops, on the evening of the 28th instant, our forces were able to bivouac for the night beyond the Gap.

The next morning at daylight the march was again resumed, with this division in the advance, Lieutenant-Colonel Upton, of the Fifth Texas, in command of a party of select Texan riflemen, constituting the advance guard. Coming up with the rear guard of the enemy before sunrise, this gallant and distinguished officer drove them before him so rapidly that halts would have to be made for the troops in rear to rest.

Early in the day we came up with the main body of the enemy on the plains of Manassas, engaging General Jackson's forces. Disposition of the troops being made, the Texas brigade advanced in line of battle down and on the immediate right of the pike leading to the stone bridge, and Colonel Law's brigade on the left. Arriving on a line with the line of battle established by General Jackson, the division was halted by order of the general commanding.

About 4 o'clock in the afternoon the enemy made a fierce attack upon General Jackson, his noble troops holding their ground with their usual gallantry. At sunset an order came to me from the commanding general to move forward and attack the enemy. Before, however, this division could come to attention it was attacked, and I instantly ordered the two brigades to move forward and charge the enemy, which they did most gallantly, driving them in confusion in front of them. Colonel Law's brigade, being engaged with a very heavy force of the enemy, captured one piece of artillery, three stand of colors, and one hundred prisoners, and the Texas brigade three stand of colors. It soon became so very dark that it was impossible to pursue the enemy any farther.

At 12 o'clock at night orders came to retake our position on the right of General Jackson, in which we remained until 4 o'clock the next afternoon, August 30, when the battle of the plains of Manassas commenced. (Page 605.)

On August 29, after a fatiguing day's march, my regiment, with the rest of the brigade, was put in line of battle in support of General Hood's brigade. The line was scarcely formed when the order was given, "Forward." The obscurity of the hour caused me to separate from the brigade; but I moved forward until within a few yards of the enemy's camp-fires. I was met by a messenger, who assured me that the camp was already occupied by a Texas regiment. Halting, I sent a messenger to report to General Evans. (Page 630.)

HDQRS. SECOND CORPS, ARMY OF NORTHERN VIRGINIA,
April 27, 1863.

GENERAL: I have the honor herewith to submit to you a report of the operations of my command from August 15 to September 5, 1862, embracing the several engagements of Manassas Junction, Bristoe Station, Ox Hill, and so much of the battle of Groveton (on August 28, 29, and 30) as was fought by the troops under my command:

* * * * * * *

The next morning (29th) I found that he had abandoned the ground occupied as the battlefield the evening before and had moved farther to the east and to my left, placing himself between my command and the Federal capital. My troops on this day were distributed along and in the vicinity of the cut of an unfinished railroad (intended as a part of the track to connect the Manassas road directly with Alexandria), stretching from the Warrenton turnpike in the direction of Sudley's mill. It was mainly along the excavation of this unfinished road that my line of battle was formed on the 29th—Jackson's division, under Brigadier-General Starke, on the right, Ewell's division, under Brigadier-General Lawton, in the center, and Hill's division on the left.

In the morning, about 10 o'clock, the Federal artillery opened with spirit and animation upon our right, which was soon replied to by the batteries of Poague, Carpenter, Dement, Brockenbrough, and Latimer, under Major [L. M.] Shumaker. This lasted for some time, when the enemy moved around more to our left to another point of attack. His next effort was directed against our left. This was vigorously repulsed by the batteries of Braxton, Crenshaw, and Pegram.

About 2 p. m. the Federal infantry in large force advanced to the attack of our left, occupied by the division of General Hill. It pressed forward, in defiance of our fatal and destructive fire, with great determination, a portion of it crossing a deep cut in the railroad track and penetrating in heavy force an interval of nearly 175 yards, which separated the right of Gregg's from the left of Thomas's brigade. For a short time Gregg's brigade, on the extreme left, was isolated from the main body of the command; but the Fourteenth South Carolina Regiment, then in reserve, with the Forty-ninth Georgia, left of Colonel Thomas, attacked the exultant enemy with vigor and drove them back across the railroad track with great slaughter. General McGowan reports that the opposing forces at one time delivered their volleys into each other at the distance of 10 paces. Assault after assault was made on the left, exhibiting on the part of the enemy great pertinacity and determination, but every advance was most successfully and gallantly driven back.

General Hill reports that six separate and distinct assaults were thus met and repulsed by his division, assisted by Hays's brigade, Colonel Forno commanding.

By this time the brigade of General Gregg, which from its position on the extreme left was most exposed to the enemy's attack, had nearly expended its ammunition. It had suffered severely in its men, and all its field officers except two were killed or wounded. About 4 o'clock it had been assisted by Hays's brigade (Colonel Forno). It was now retired to the rear to take some repose after seven hours of severe service, and General Early's brigade, of Ewell's division, with the Eighth Louisiana Regiment, took its place. On reaching his position General Early found that the enemy had obtained possession of the railroad and a piece of wood in front, there being at this point a deep cut, which furnished a strong defense. Moving through a field he advanced upon the enemy, drove them from the wood and railroad cut with great slaughter, and followed in pursuit some 200 yards; the Thirteenth Georgia at the same time advanced to the railroad and crossed with Early's brigade. [Report of Maj. Gen. Ambrose P. Hill, commanding second division, of operations August 20 to September 2.]

HEADQUARTERS LIGHT DIVISION.
Camp Gregg, Virginia, February 25, 1863.

Friday morning, in accordance with orders from General Jackson, I occupied the line of the unfinished railroad, my extreme left resting near Sudley Ford, my right near the point where the road strikes the open field, Gregg, Field, and Thomas in the front line, Gregg on the left, and Field on the right, with Branch, Pender, and Archer as supports. My batteries were in the open field in rear of the infantry, the nature of my position being such as to preclude the effective use of much artillery. The evident intention of the enemy this day was to turn our left and overwhelm Jackson's corps before Longstreet came up, and to accomplish this the most persistent and furious onsets were made by column after column of infantry, accompanied by numerous batteries of artillery. Soon my reserves were all in, and up to 6 o'clock my division, assisted by the Louisiana brigade of General Hays, commanded by Colonel Forno, with a heroic courage and obstinacy almost beyond parallel, had met and repulsed six distinct and separate assaults, a portion of the time the majority of the men being without a cartridge.

The reply of the gallant Gregg to a message of mine is worthy of note: "Tell General Hill that my ammunition is exhausted, but that I will hold my position with the bayonet." The enemy prepared for a last and determined attempt. Their serried masses, overwhelming superiority of numbers, and bold bearing made the chances of victory to tremble in the balance; my own division exhausted by seven hours' unremitted fighting, hardly one round per man remaining, and weakened in all things save its unconquerable spirit. Casting about for help, fortunately it was here reported to me that the brigades of Generals Lawton and Early were near by, and sending to them they promptly moved to my front at the most opportune moment, and this last charge met the same disastrous fate that had befallen those preceding. Having received an order from General Jackson to endeavor to avoid a general engagement, my commanders of brigades contented themselves with repulsing the enemy and following them up but a few hundred yards.

During the night of the 29th my brigades were engaged in refilling cartridge boxes and generally putting themselves in condition for the morrow's fight. (Pages 670, 671.)

[Report of Brig. Gen. Samuel McGowan, C. S. Army, commanding Gregg's brigade.]

HEADQUARTERS SECOND BRIGADE, A. P. HILL'S LIGHT DIVISION,
Camp Gregg, Virginia, February 9, 1863.

* * * * * * *

We slept upon our arms near Ewell's battlefield, and the next morning at early dawn returned near the position first taken up by us the evening before, and were placed in line of battle on the extreme left of the whole command near Catharpin Run. We occupied a small, rocky, wooded knoll, having a railroad excavation bending around the east and north fronts and a cleared field on the northwest. This position was slightly in advance of the general line, and besides being on the extreme left, was considered important because of the Sudley Ford road, which it commanded. Our line made an obtuse angle, pointing toward the enemy, one side of which ran nearly parallel with the railroad cut and the other along the fence bordering the cleared field before spoken of. Within these contracted limits was the little tongue of woodland which we occupied, and which we were directed to hold at all hazards.

On this spot, barely large enough to hold the brigade, we stood and fought with intervals of cessation from 8 o'clock in the morning until dark. We repulsed many successive charges, I believe seven, the enemy constantly throwing fresh columns upon us, and persisting in his effort to carry the point with the utmost obstinacy. During the different struggles of the day the regiments were relieved and shifted as occasion required. The space covered by the brigade was so small and the distance between the regiments so inconsiderable that I would not be able, if it were necessary, to state all the movements which were made. I can only advert to the positions of the respective regiments at one or two important junctures during the day.

* * * * * * *

It was now 4 p. m., and there was no abatement in the fury of the assaults, when the brigades of Generals Branch and Early, having been sent to our assistance, came in most opportunely and gallantly. After these re-enforcements had arrived and passed to the front General Gregg collected the remnant of his regiments, and, placing them in line behind the troops now engaged, gave them instructions to lie down, and if our friends were overpowered and had to fall back over them to wait until the enemy was very near, then rise and drive them back at the point of the bayonet. The men all lay down as instructed, resolved as the last resort to try the virtue of the cold steel, but happily the necessity did not arise. The enemy were finally driven back at all points, and night closed upon us occupying the identical spot which we were ordered to hold in the morning.

We slept on the field of battle and remained in position all the next day, while the great battle of the Second Manassas was progressing on our right. The enemy made several attempts to advance, but the admirable practice of Captain McIntosh's battery kept them beyond musket-range, scattering them with shot and shell every time they moved forward. Some few men were wounded by shell, but we were not very actively engaged on that day.

Friday, the 29th, was the glorious but bloody day for the brigade. (Pages 680, 681.)

[Report of Brig. Gen. James J. Archer, Confederate States army, commanding brigade, of operations August 24-September 2.]

HEADQUARTERS ARCHER'S BRIGADE,
Camp Gregg, near Fredericksburg, Va., March 1, 1863.

MAJOR: I have the honor to present the following report of the operations of my brigade in the series of battles from Warrenton Springs Ford to Shepherdstown, inclusive:

* * * * * * *

About 4 p. m., during an interval of the assaults of the enemy, General Pender sent his aid-de-camp, requesting me to relieve him, and with the consent of General Hill, who was near me at the time, I immediately marched down and filed to the right into the railroad cut. As my leading files entered the railroad cut I perceived the enemy advancing up it from the left into the wood. Unwilling to commence the fight until my troops were in position, I did not call their attention to the enemy until half of my last regiment (Colonel Turney's, First Tennessee) had entered the cut. I then pointed out the enemy on the left and ordered that regiment to fire, which it did with great effect. The first fire of this regiment was instantly answered by a furious assault upon my whole front.

At this time my own brigade was the only one in sight along the whole line, but for twenty minutes or more it firmly and gallantly resisted the attack and maintained its position until other troops came on my right and left in time to save me from being flanked. Soon after the arrival of these fresh troops we charged and drove the enemy back several hundred yards, and then quietly returned to our position. In a few minutes fresh forces of the enemy arrived and attacked us as vigorously as the first. They were as firmly resisted and as gallantly repelled by another charge. At this second charge many of my men were out of ammunition, and charged with empty rifles I did not average over two cartridges to the man. A third assault was met and repulsed in the same manner, my brigade charging upon the enemy with loud cheers and driving them back with their empty rifles.

It was after sunset when we resumed our position, and we lay upon our arms that night with a strong picket in front to prevent surprise. (Page 699, 700.)

[Report of Maj. Gen. James E. B. Stuart, C. S. Army, commanding cavalry of the Army of Northern Virginia, of operations August 15 to September 2.]

HDQRS. STUART'S CAV. DIV., ARMY OF N. VA.,
February 28, 1863.

GENERAL: I have the honor to furnish the following summary of events in which my command participated immediately preceding and subsequent to the second battle of Manassas, or, as it should be more properly termed, the battle of Groveton Heights, August 30, 1862:

* * * * * * *

The next morning (29th), in pursuance of General Jackson's wishes, I set out again to endeavor to establish communication with Longstreet, from whom he had received a favorable report the night before. Just after leaving the Sudley road my party was fired on from the woods bordering the road, which was in rear of Jackson's lines and which the enemy had penetrated with small force, it was afterward ascertained, and captured some stragglers. They were between General Jackson and his baggage at Sudley.

I immediately sent to Major [W.] Patrick, whose six companies of cavalry were near Sudley, to interpose in defense of the baggage and use all the means at hand for its protection, and ordered the baggage at once to start for Aldie. General Jackson, also being notified of this movement in his rear, sent back infantry to clear the woods. Captain Pelham, always at the right place at the right time, unlimbered his battery and soon dispersed that portion in the woods. Major Patrick was attacked later, but he repulsed the enemy with considerable loss, though not without loss to us, for the gallant major, himself setting the example to his men, was mortally wounded. He lived long enough to witness the triumph of our arms, and expired thus in the arms of victory. The sacrifice was noble, but the loss to us irreparable.

I met with the head of General Longstreet's column between Hay Market and Gainesville, and there communicated to the commanding general General Jackson's position and the enemy's. I then passed the cavalry through the column, so as to place it on Longstreet's right flank, and advanced directly toward Manassas, while the column kept directly down the pike to join General Jackson's right. I selected a fine position for a battery on the right, and one having been sent to me, I fired a few shots at the enemy's supposed position, which induced him to shift his position. General Robertson, who with his command was sent to reconnoiter farther down the road toward Manassas, reported the enemy in his front. Upon repairing to that front I found that Rosser's regiment was engaged with the enemy to the left of the road and Robertson's vedettes had found the enemy approaching from the direction of Bristoe Station toward Sudley.

The prolongation of his line of march would have passed through my position, which was a very fine one for artillery as well as observation, and struck Longstreet in flank. I waited his approach long enough to ascertain that there was at least an army corps, at the same time keeping detachments of cavalry dragging brush down the road from the direction of Gainesville, so as to deceive the enemy—a ruse which Porter's report shows was successful—and notified the commanding general, then opposite me on the turnpike, that Longstreet's flank and rear were seriously threatened, and of the importance to us of the ridge I then held. Immediately upon receipt of that intelligence Jenkins's, Kemper's, and D. R. Jones's brigades and several pieces of artillery were ordered to me by General Longstreet, and, being placed in position fronting Bristoe, awaited the enemy's advance. After exchanging a few shots with rifle pieces, this corps withdrew toward Manassas, leaving artillery and supports to hold the position until night. (Pages 735, 736.)

From these official reports I gather the following facts as to the duration of the battle, the character of the conflict, and the losses in men:

First. At the battle of Groveton, August 29, 1862, we have seen from the official reports that there were engaged:

1. UNION.

1. Sigel's entire corps, three divisions, all day.
2. Reno's, small division, Ninth Corps, from 10 o'clock.
3. Heintzelman's corps, two divisions, from about 10 o'clock.
4. McDowell's corps, two divisions, during evening.

Total, four corps, eight divisions.

2. CONFEDERATES.

General T. J. Jackson's corps: General Taliaferro's division, General A. P. Hill's division, General Ewell's (Lawton's) division, all day.

General James Longstreet's corps: General Wilcox's division, General Hood's division, General Kemper's division, (Hunton's brigade), last part of day.

General Jones watching Porter.

Total, two corps, six divisions.

DURATION OF CONFLICT.

Second. The time engaged:

General Pope says it "lasted with continuous fury from daylight until after dark." "Shortly after daylight Sigel and Reynolds's divisions of McDowell's corps had become engaged." "Darkness closed the action on Friday."

General Sigel says: "Formed in order of battle at daybreak." "From 6.30 to 10.30 in the morning our whole infantry force and nearly all our batteries were engaged." "At 10.30 the enemy threw forward large masses of infantry." "Major-General Kearny arrived on the field of battle and deployed by the Sudley Springs road on our right." "General Reno's troops came to our support by the Gainesville turnpike." "The contest began with renewed vigor and vehemence, the enemy attacking furiously along the whole line." "At 2 o'clock in the afternoon General Hooker's troops arrived on the field of battle, and were immediately ordered forward by their noble commander into battle." "During two hours, from 4 to 6 p. m., strong cannonading and musketry continued on our center and right." "At 6.15 Brigadier-General King's division of Major-General McDowell's corps arrived behind our front and advanced on the Gainesville pike."

Schenck says: "On Friday morning early the engagement was commenced by General Milroy on our right, in which we soon took part." "We remained here nearly an hour, the firing in the mean while becoming heavy on the right."

Schurz says: "On the 29th, a little after 5 o'clock a. m., you ordered me to cross the turnpike, to deploy my division north of it, and attack the forces of the enemy." "Meanwhile the fire in front had extended along the whole line and become very lively." "It was about 10 a. m., when an officer announced to me that General Kearny had arrived on the battlefield." "My troops, who had started at 5 o'clock in the morning, mostly without breakfast, had been under fire for eight hours." "Re-enforcements arrived in my front between 1 and 2 o'clock." "Worn down as my men were, my division was unable to take part in the action after 2 o'clock p. m."

Milroy says: "The following morning, the 29th, at daylight I was ordered to proceed in search of the rebels." "The enemy now [p. m.] came on in overwhelming numbers. General Carl Schurz had been obliged to retire with his two brigades an hour before." "When the storm was raging fiercest General Stahel came to me and reported," &c. "Toward evening General Grover came up with his New England brigade."

McDowell says: "I received your instructions to order the division over to the north of the turnpike to support the line held by Reno, which had been hotly engaged all day. It was now near dusk, and though the men had now been on foot since 1 o'clock in the morning, they moved forward with the greatest enthusiasm."

Hatch says: "Late on the afternoon of the 29th I was ordered by General McDowell in person to move the division on the Gainesville road in pursuit of the enemy," &c. "The struggle, lasting some three-quarters of an hour, was a desperate one. Night had now come on."

Colonel McCoy, commanding first brigade, Ricketts's division, says: "At the dawn of the next morning, the 29th, we were again upon the road to Massassas." "At the close of the day we arrived upon the ground, the battle still in progress." "Bivouacked on the field, while the balls and shells of the enemy were still flying over and around them."

Reynolds says: "The action was continued with it until dark by Meade's brigade."

Heintzelman says: "At 10 a. m. I reached the field of battle." "At 11 the head of Hooker's division arrived; General Reno an hour later." "General Grover reported, and before long became engaged." "The firing continued until some time after dark."

Kearny says: "During the first hours of the combat General Birney pushed across," &c. "In the early afternoon General Pope's order, per General Roberts, was to send a pretty strong force diagonally to the front," &c. "At 5 o'clock * * * I brought up the most of Birney's regiments * * * to sweep with a rush the enemy's first line."

Grover says: "Arrived on the battlefield about 9 a. m." "The battle had already commenced." "At 3 p. m. I received an order to advance in line of battle."

Carr says: "About 11 a. m., ordered into position." "Received orders to take balance of brigade into woods, which I did about 2 p. m.; here I engaged the enemy and fought him for a space of two hours." "About 4 o'clock we were relieved by General Reno."

Either there is a vast amount of lying in these reports, or else Pope was about right when in his dispatch to Halleck, written during that night and sent at 5 o'clock next morning, he said the battle "lasted with continuous fury from daylight until after dark."

I will now introduce some witnesses whom our friends on the other side will scarcely dispute, because they are certainly disinterested witnesses so far as this question is concerned.

R. E. Lee says: "On the morning of the 29th the whole command resumed the march, the sound of cannon announcing that Jackson was already engaged. Engaged the enemy vigorously for several hours. The battle continued until 9 p. m."

Longstreet says: "The noise of battle was heard before we reached Gainesville. Hood, supported by Evans, made a gallant attack, driving the enemy back until 9 o'clock at night."

Hood says: "About 4 o'clock in the afternoon, the enemy made a fierce attack on General Jackson. It soon became so dark that it was impossible to pursue the enemy farther."

Jackson says: "About 10 o'clock the Federal artillery opened. About 2 o'clock the Federal infantry advanced."

Hill says: "Up to 6 o'clock my division * * * had met and repulsed six distinct and separate assaults."

McGowan says: "We stood and fought with intervals of cessation from 8 o'clock in the morning until dark."

THIRD. AS TO THE CHARACTER OF THE BATTLE.

Lee says: "The battle raged with great fury." "The enemy was repeatedly repulsed, but again pressed on to the attack with fresh troops." "The contest was close and obstinate." "The enemy was repulsed by Hood after a severe contest."

Jackson says: "It [Federal infantry] pressed forward in defiance of our fatal and destructive fire with great determination." "Assault after assault was made." "Six separate and distinct assaults were thus met and repulsed."

A. P. Hill says: "The enemy prepared for a last and determined attempt. Their serried masses, overwhelming superiority of numbers, and bold bearing made the chances of victory to tremble in the balance." "My own division, exhausted by seven hours' unremitted fighting."

McGowan says: "We repulsed many successive charges; I believe seven."

Archer says: "The first fire of this regiment was answered by a furious assault on my whole front."

General Pope says: "We fought a terrific battle." "Lasted with continuous fury." "The action raged furiously all day."

General Sigel says: "The contest began with renewed vigor and vehemence, the enemy attacking furiously along the whole line."

General Schurz says: "The enemy made another furious charge upon my center." "I then ordered a general advance of my whole line, which was executed with great gallantry."

General Milroy says: "My brave lads were dashed back before the storm of bullets like chaff before the tempest."

General McDowell says: "The attack was severe both on the enemy and on our men.

General Hatch says: "The struggle * * * was a desperate one, being in many instances a hand-to-hand conflict."

Colonel McCoy says: "The battle then raging with great fury." "The rebels being strongly pressed and yielding ground."

Reynolds says: "Compelled to fall back before the heavy fire of artillery and musketry which met them."

General Meade says: "The renewed heavy musketry fire on our center had driven General Hooker's troops."

Heintzelman says: "The most gallant and determined bayonet charge of the war."

Kearny says: "General Robinson drove forward for several hundred yards, but the center of the main battle being shortly after driven back," &c.

Robinson says: "My regiments which were suffering from a terrific fire of musketry and the enemy's artillery."

Grover says: "An obstinate hand-to-hand conflict with bayonets and clubbed muskets." "Met a terrific fire from a second line, which in its turn broke."

Captain Young says: "The battle raged fearfully, the enemy making a desperate stand, never flinching."

If this engagement is to be judged by the desperate and unflinching character of the conflict, which delivers and withstands seven successive assaults, which empties cartridge-boxes of 60 rounds of cartridge, then this was a great battle.

FOURTH. LOSSES IN THE BATTLE OF AUGUST 29, 1862.

Return of casualties in the Union forces, commanded by Maj. Gen. John Pope during the operations August 16–September 2, 1862, inclusive.

This includes all the fighting on the Rappahannock, the battles at Catlett's 25th, Kettle Run 26th and 27th, Manassas 26th and 27th, Bull Run Bridge 27th, Thoroughfare Gap and Gibbon's fight 28th, Groveton 29th, Bull Run 30th, and Chantilly September 1, and nearly one-half that entire loss was on the 29th, at Groveton.

I believe that it is demonstrable that one-half of this entire loss occurred upon the 29th.

The loss of Sigel's corps was two thousand and eighty-seven, nearly all upon the 29th. The loss of McDowell's corps was five thousand four hundred and sixty-nine, of which fully one-half was on the 29th. The loss of Heintzelman's corps was two thousand two hundred and thirty-eight, by far the greater part on the 29th. The total loss of Porter's corps was two thousand one hundred and fifty-one, all but three on the 30th. The total loss of Sykes's division during entire period, nine hundred and eighteen, of which four hundred and twelve was from Warren's little brigade, leaving five hundred and six for the rest of the division, including three batteries. Morell's loss, one thousand two hundred and thirty-three, of which five hundred and seventy-six was in Roberts's brigade; five hundred and ninety in Butterfield's brigade.

These figures are taken from the official reports of The War of the Rebellion.

The loss of the 29th could not have fallen short of six thousand killed and wounded.

Pope says: "We have lost not less than eight thousand men killed and wounded." (Dispatch 5 a. m., August 30, from field of battle.)

"Our loss during that day was not less than six thousand or eight thousand killed and wounded, and I think this estimate will be confirmed by the general reports which cover the losses. (Report, September 3, 1862.)

Schurz says: "My troops * * * had been decimated by enormous losses."

Milroy says: "I rallied the shattered remnant of my brigade."

Hatch (King's division) says: "Our loss had been severe."

Heintzelman says: "The loss of this brigade (Grover's), numbering less than two thousand present, was a total of four hundred and eighty-four, nearly all killed and wounded."

Robertson says: "Our loss in this action was severe, embracing some of our best officers. The enemy's loss must have been very great."

General R. E. Lee says: "Our loss was severe in this engagement. His (Pope's) loss on this day (29th), as stated in his published report herewith inclosed, amounting to eight thousand killed and wounded."

SUMMARY.

From these official reports it appears that the forces engaged on the 29th consisted of eight divisions of the Union Army and six divisions of the confederate army, comprising the best fighting material of both armies (if Porter's corps be excepted). If the divisions be estimated at five thousand each only, that would make forty thousand on the Union side and thirty thousand on the confederate side. In fact Jackson alone had twenty-two thousand men.

These armies were under the immediate command of Lee and Pope, the commanding generals, assisted by such generals as Jackson, Longstreet, McDowell, Hooker, and Kearney. The battle continued from sunrise until after dark. It "raged with continuous fury." The losses were not less than six thousand on the Union side, and Generals Hooker and Kearney, two good fighters, estimated that the confederate loss was greater. And yet the Schofield board and General Grant base the reversal of the finding of the court-martial upon the supposed fact that there was no battle upon the 29th.

I have recently read the Personal Memoirs of General Grant, including his history of the so-called Mexican war, and his account of certain so-called "battles." It has been considered something of a war; yet the losses in battle of General Scott from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico, and, I believe, in that entire war, were less than the losses of the Union Army on the 29th of August, 1862.

There has been an impression abroad that there was a battle fought at Bunker Hill in 1775. Yet the American losses on that day in killed, wounded, and missing were only four hundred and fifty-two—less than the loss in Grover's Brigade alone on the 29th in a single charge.

There has been a popular superstition abroad that a "battle" was fought at Bull Run on the 21st of August, 1861, under the command of Beauregard on the one side and McDowell on the other. Yet the entire loss of the Union Army on that day was but two thousand nine hundred and fifty-two, of which about one thousand was in prisoners, or, in other words, the killed and wounded were about one-third the killed and wounded on the 29th of August, 1862. And yet, in the face of these well-known and incontrovertible facts, the defense and restoration of Fitz-John Porter is made to hinge upon the claim that there was no battle upon the 29th of August, 1862.

I do not believe that in all the history of civil or military trials so astounding a proposition was ever before advanced. There are probably living to-day forty thousand men who took part in that battle.

We shall next be told that there was no civil war; that there was a "labor riot" in Gettysburg, a "strike" at Vicksburg, and the sheriff's posse succeeded in arresting the rioters at Appomattox. [Applause and laughter.] I am about ready to believe with the Berkeleian philosophy, that there is no external world, and therefore no history; that life and so-called events are simply a series of internal impressions, with no corresponding external phenomena. [Laughter.] The keystone of the arch of Porter's defense having fallen, the whole arch tumbles about the heads of those who support it. [Continued applause.]

FIFTH. DID PORTER KNOW THERE WAS A BATTLE?

If he did he was not to blame for it. He stopped just as far from it as he could, and then went 2½ miles from the head of his own column, back behind a hill, and laid down in the woods, 5 miles from the main battle and 4 miles from the nearest fighting. But even there the sounds of battle reached him. We know this beyond question from his own dispatches to McDowell at the time.

General Porter reported to General McDowell his views and intentions in the following dispatches:

GENERALS MCDOWELL and KING:

I found it impossible to communicate by crossing the woods to Groveton. The enemy are in great force on this road, and as they appear to have driven our forces back, the fire of the enemy having advanced and ours retired, I have determined to withdraw to Manassas. I have attempted to communicate with McDowell and Sigel, but my messengers have run into the enemy. They have gathered artillery and cavalry and infantry, and the advancing masses of dust show the enemy coming in force. I am now going to the head of the column to see what is passing and how affairs are going, and I will communicate with you. Had you not better send your train back?

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

GENERAL MCDOWELL OR KING: I have been wandering over the woods and failed to get a communication to you. Tell how matters go with you. The enemy is in strong force in front of me, and I wish to know your designs for to-night. If left to me, I shall have to retire for food and water, which I can not get here. How goes the battle? It seems to go to our rear. The enemy are getting to our left.

F. J. PORTER,
Major-General Volunteers.

GENERAL MCDOWELL: The firing on my right has so far retired that, as I can not advance and have failed to get over to you except by the route taken by King, I shall withdraw to Manassas. If you have anything to communicate, please do so. I have sent many messengers to you and General Sigel and get nothing.

F. J. PORTER,
Major-General.

(Report Schofield board, volume 12, page 2, War of Rebellion.)

McDowell's testimony (page 85, G. C. M.):

Was or not the battle raging at that time? [while Porter and McDowell were together at Dawkin's Branch about 12 m.].

A. The battle was raging on our right.

Col. E. G. Marshall, who was one of Porter's chief witnesses both on the court-martial and before the board and who commanded Porter's skirmish line that day, testified before the court as follows:

About the same time, before I went in to General Morell, I could hear and judge of the result of the fighting between the force of the enemy and General Pope's army. I could see General Pope's left and the enemy's right during the greatest part of the day about 2 miles off, perhaps more, diagonally to our front and right. The enemy set up their cheering, and appeared to be charging and driving us, so that not a man of my command but what was certain that General Pope's army was being driven from the field.

He goes on to describe how he could distinguish "the enemy's yell when they are successful," which he describes as "a continual yelling." I presume that may bring it vividly to the minds and memory of many of us.

Porter knew there was a battle, and fully believed it was going against Pope.

WHEN DID LONGSTREET ARRIVE, and was his whole corps present?

General D. R. Jones had forced the passage of Thoroughfare Gap on the night of the 28th and "bivouacked beyond [east of] the gap." Jones led the advance on the 29th. He says he arrived on the ground "about noon."

Col. P. F. Stevens, commanding Evans's brigade, Hood's division (which came up next after Jones), says: "On August 29, after a fatiguing day's march, my regiment, with the rest of the brigade, was put in line of battle to support Hood's brigade. The line was scarcely formed when the order was given, 'forward.' The obscurity of the hour caused me to separate from the brigade." So it must have been quite late when Evans's brigade arrived.

William M. Owen (adjutant, Washington Artillery): "Marched to Groveton at the head of the column, directly after the escort of Lee and Longstreet. Reached the battlefield at 11.30 a. m." (Schofield board, page 552.)

At noon on the 29th, the two batteries in reserve, having halted near the village of Gainesville, 3 miles from field, on the Warrenton and Centreville turnpike, were ordered forward by General Longstreet to engage the enemy, then in our front and near the village of Groveton. Captains Miller and Squires at once proceeded to the position indicated by the general and opened fire upon the enemy's batteries." (Major Walton, commanding Washington Artillery, volume 12, page 2, page 571.)

We may also approximate the arrival of Lee and Longstreet from J. E. B. Stuart's report (War of Rebellion, volume 12, part 2, page 740), as follows:

Friday, August 29, as General Stuart rode forward toward Groveton, about 10 a. m., he found that the enemy's sharpshooters had penetrated the woods, going toward the ambulances and train, threatening to cut them off. He at once directed Captain (now Major) Pelham, of the Stuart Horse Artillery, who was near by, to shell the woods and gather up all the stragglers around the train and drive back the enemy. Notifying General Jackson in the mean time of what was transpiring, he also ordered the quartermaster to move the train toward Aldie, and sent an order to Major Patrick to keep his battalion of cavalry between the enemy and the baggage train, a duty which he faithfully discharged, receiving a mortal wound just as he gallantly and successfully repulsed a large force of the enemy that was attempting to cross the run. General Stuart also sent to Colonel Baylor, who was near the railroad embankment, in command of the Stonewall Brigade, asking him to come forward and drive back the enemy; but he replied, "I was posted here for a purpose, and have positive orders to stay here, which I must obey."

Having ordered Captain Pelham to report to General Jackson, General Stuart went toward Hay Market to establish communication with Generals Lee and Longstreet, accompanied by Brigadier-General Robertson with a portion of his and portion of General Fitzhugh Lee's cavalry. General Stuart met Generals Lee and Longstreet on the road between Hay Market and Gainesville, and informed them of what had happened and the situation of General Jackson's forces and those of the enemy. General Lee inquired for some way to the Sudley road. General Stuart showed him that the best route for them was by the turnpike, which they took, and General Stuart moved to Longstreet's right flank. The detachment of cavalry under General Fitzhugh Lee that had been to Burke's Station returned in the p. m. of this day to the vicinity of General Jackson, at Sudley.

The night of Friday, August 29, General Stuart was 2 miles east of General Longstreet's command.

The attack was made on Jackson's train "about 10 a. m." near Sudley Ford. Stuart remained there until the attack was repulsed; rode toward Hay Market. Stuart met Lee and Longstreet between Hay Market and Gainesville. After leaving Sudley he must have ridden with his column at least 6 miles. He met Lee and Longstreet at the head of their column, communicated the situation, then passed his cavalry division—about two thousand cavalry—through the column, and went to the right toward Manassas.

This would give us this time-table: Attack on train, 10 a. m.; repulsed in, say, one-half hour, 10.30 a. m.; ride to Hay Market, 6 miles, say, one hour, 11.30 a. m.; interview with Lee and passing a division of cavalry through column, one hour, 12.30 p. m. (see Longstreet in February Century); march of Longstreet's infantry from point where Stuart met him to point where line was formed, at Pageland lane, 3½ miles, one and one-half hours, 2 p. m.

Longstreet's command was coming in a very forced and disordered march from the direction of Thoroughfare Gap, moving rapidly and straggling badly.

How long would it require to close up in mass and deploy into line of battle say twenty-four thousand troops, "coming in a very forced and disordered march, straggling badly?" I apprehend that four divisions of infantry, with artillery, ammunition trains, and other impedimenta, would occupy not less than from two to two and one-half hours in closing up and getting into line of battle. That would bring us to 4 p. m. or 4.30 p. m.

Colonel Marshall, in his testimony before the court, swore that Longstreet's force "continued to come down all day; in fact, until 1 o'clock at night."

From all this I draw the conclusion that Lee, personally, arrived at Gainesville, 3 miles from the battle, at about noon; that by 1 o'clock the Washington Artillery (at the head of the column) reached the vicinity of Jackson's right, near Pageland lane; that by 2 o'clock the head of Longstreet's infantry began to go into line on the turnpike; that they were arriving all the afternoon; that Evans's brigade of Hood's division did not arrive until near night; that Longstreet's forces continued to arrive through the night; that the only force of Longstreet's troops within 2 miles of Porter up to 4.30 was D. R. Jones's and a small force of cavalry; that if Porter had moved promptly on arriving at Dawkin's Branch he could have seized the Monroe Hill and prevented the union of Lee and Jackson that afternoon.

The troops which Porter first encountered in front of Dawkin's Branch and near the Randall house were no part of Longstreet's command, but were two regiments of Jubal A. Early's brigade of Ewell's division of Jackson's corps.

Early, in his letter to Porter, under date of February 23, 1874 (proceedings Schofield board, Senate Ex. Doc. 37, Forty-sixth Congress, page 553), says:

On the morning of the 29th I was ordered by Jackson to take a position on his right and about 1 mile from his main body with my own and Hays's Louisiana brigades, * * * in order to watch a body of Federal troops reported to be moving up from the direction of Manassas Junction. * * * Two regiments of my brigade were detached by General Jackson and placed southeast of the Warrenton pike in the direction of Manassas from my main position for the purpose of observing and reporting the approach of the opposing force * * * Early in the day my two advanced regiments began skirmishing with the advance of the force coming from the direction of Manassas.

(See also testimony of General Early, Schofield board, page 810 [850.])

Now, we know that there was no other force "coming from the direction of Manassas" that day on that road but Porter's command. The only force in front of him then on his arrival at his most advanced point was two regiments of Early's brigade and the cavalry outposts. If he had promptly deployed a brigade, supported by another, instead of halting at Dawkin's Branch, he ought to have had possession of the Hampton Cole and Britt's ridge in thirty minutes. He would then have been in communication with Reynolds's left, and if forced to fall back would have fallen back to his right, and reunited Pope's army. This was his order. This order he disobeyed. The result was the crushing repulse of Reynolds and Hatch that evening between sundown and 9 o'clock.

I think that I have demonstrated, if anything in human history is capable of demonstration, that that Porter knew it from the sounds of battle; that he fully believed that the battle was going against Pope and the Union Army; that he did stand from noon until 9 o'clock at night, when the battle ceased, across the right flank of the enemy—first of Jackson (Early's brigade), and later, after the middle of the afternoon, D. R. Jones, of Longstreet (with twelve thousand or more men); that he did not attack—that he did not even demonstrate with any force or vigor; that he never attempted to advance his line across Dawkin's Branch; that he made no energetic attempt of any kind to communicate with Pope's right wing; that during most of this time he was more than two miles from the head of his own troops, exhibiting the least possible concern as to what was the fate of the day, except he had a constantly recurring desire to withdraw to Manassas. Manassas was toward Alexandria, and at Alexandria was McClellan. At Groveton was the battle, and in the battle was Pope.

THERE WAS A GREAT BATTLE UPON THE 29TH;

But where did General Grant get his idea that there was no battle on the 29th? Not from the official reports, manifestly. He appears never to have read them; they are not mentioned among his three days' reading. Not from the evidence taken before the court-martial. It nowhere appears that he read that. Not from the evidence taken before the Schofield board. He asked for that in his letter of December 23, 1881, after he had announced his decision. He did have Schofield's report, and in that report we find the following:

The judgment of the court-martial upon General Porter's conduct was evidently based upon greatly erroneous impressions, not only respecting what that conduct really was and the orders under which he was acting, but also respecting all the circumstances under which he acted. Especially was this true in respect to the character of the battle of the 29th of August.

* * * * * * *

The reports of the 29th and those of the 30th of August have somehow been strangely confounded with each other. Even the confederate reports have, since the termination of the war, been similarly misconstrued. Those of the 30th have been misquoted as referring to the 29th, thus to prove that a furious battle was going on while Porter was comparatively inactive on the 29th. The fierce and gallant struggle of his own troops on the 30th has thus been used to sustain the original error under which he was condemned. General Porter was, in effect, condemned for not having taken any part in his own battle. Such was the error upon which General Porter was pronounced guilty of the most shameful crime known among soldiers. We believe not one among all the gallant soldiers on that bloody field was less deserving of such condemnation than he.

It was from this report that General Grant drew his facts, a most unsafe source from which to derive facts. That report was made expressly to acquit. If the facts did not fit that end, then so much the worse for the facts.

Now what was the origin of and how much was there of this ALLEGED CONFUSION OF THE 29TH WITH THE 30TH?

The facts are simply as follows: After Porter made his appeal to President Grant in 1869 General McDowell obtained from the confederate archives in charge of the War Department extracts from the official reports of Longstreet, Stuart, and Jackson, and sent them in the form of printed slips to General Pope, then in command of the Department of the Lakes. General Pope was preparing a reply to Porter's statement under the title of "A brief view," and as he designed using some of the extracts, he forwarded them to General Ed. Schriver, Inspector-General, and confidential secretary to the Secretary of War, with the request that he would verify the extracts as true extracts from the official reports in question for the operations of the 29th August, 1862. General Schriver replied under date of 7th January, 1870, saying:

I am now able to inclose the printed extracts from the rebel commanders' reports of engagements certified to by the Adjutant-General.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman permit me to correct him?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. The certificate that was appended to that circular which was made by the Adjutant-General did not have any heading. McDowell placed upon it a heading, "Operations 29th day of August." So that your witnesses certified to a falsehood, and distributed it over the United States as evidence by which to convict.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It was certified by the Adjutant-General to be a correct copy of the records on file in the War Department.

One of these extracts was a brief portion of the report of General T. J. Jackson, which was supposed to relate to the charge of General Grover's brigade on the afternoon of the 29th, but which, upon the publication of the entire report subsequently, proved to relate to the charge of Butterfield's brigade over the same ground on the 30th. The extract was as follows:

After some desultory skirmishing and heavy cannonading during the day, the Federal infantry, about 4 o'clock in the evening, moved from under cover of the wood and advanced in several lines, first engaging the right, but soon extending its attack to the center and left. In a few moments our entire line was engaged in a fierce and sanguinary struggle with the enemy. As one line was repulsed another took its place and pressed forward as if determined by force of numbers and fury of assault to drive us from our positions. So impetuous and well sustained were these onsets as to induce me to send to the commanding general for re-enforcements, but the timely and gallant advance of General Longstreet on the right relieved my troops from the pressure of overwhelming numbers and gave to those brave men the chances of a more equal conflict. As Longstreet pressed upon the right the Federal advance was checked, and soon a general advance of my whole line was ordered. Eagerly and fiercely did each brigade press forward, exhibiting in parts of the field scenes of close encounter and murderous strife not witnessed often in the turmoil of battle. The Federals gave way before our troops, fell back in disorder, and fled precipitately, leaving their dead and wounded on the field. During their retreat the artillery opened with destructive power upon the fugitive masses. The infantry followed until darkness put an end to the pursuit.

The similarity of the assaults upon Jackson's line upon the afternoons of the 29th and 30th as to time, place, and character of the assault is exceedingly remarkable. The first was made by Hooker's troops, the one on the 30th was made by Porter's troops. This error made by the Adjutant-General in regard to this one brief extract was and is the only "confusion" that has ever arisen at any time in regard to the battles of the 29th and 30th of August, 1862. I boldly challenge the denial or refutation of this statement.

The Schofield report clearly carries the implication that this confusion in some way affected the judgment of the court-martial. But when it is considered that at the time of General Porter's conviction and sentence nothing whatever was known of the confederate reports, and that this error did not occur until seven years afterward, and was immediately corrected, it will be seen how preposterous and how false to fact this supposition is.

As General Grant himself says, his remarks as to Porter's justification "would not apply if a battle had been raging between Jackson and Pope."

I HAVE PROVED THAT A BATTLE WAS RAGING, and therefore by his own judgment his statements do not apply.

The four conditions on which General Grant says he condemned Porter are shown to have existed. They were proved before the court-martial to have existed.

Not lightly, not impulsively, not from prejudice, not malignantly did such men as Hunter and Hitchcock and Garfield cast the ballots that under any other government in the world would have condemned Porter to death. Not heedlessly nor callously did the great and kind-hearted Lincoln put his approval to the sentence.

Since this case was last before Congress, Hon. Leonard Swett, one of President Lincoln's most intimate friends, sent to the Chicago Tribune an account of an interview which he had with Mr. Lincoln when the case of General Fitz-John Porter was before him for the approval of the court-martial's verdict. The President pointed to a pile of manuscripts lying on the table, with the remark that that was the record of the case, adding: "You know that if I know anything it is what evidence tends to prove and when a thing is proved. I have read every word in that record, and I tell you Fitz-John Porter is guilty and ought to be shot."

Not lightly did Abraham Lincoln condemn any man to disgrace and obloquy, and least of all one whom but shortly before he had promoted to a major-general for his services at Malvern Hill.

Garfield condemned him. He of the full-orbed brain and tender spirit, he whose strong and logical mind went to the bottom of every question which duty called him to investigate and understand. He condemned him upon the court-martial. Himself a soldier, with all the high sense of honor of a soldier, knowing well the duty of a soldier, after seeing the witnesses face to face, after seeing and hearing the accused, and all that he had to urge in extenuation or defense, he voted for his conviction. Year after year went by, Porter made appeal after appeal; he brought forward his so-called new evidence from confederate sources; but of the case. When the Schofield board met, he watched the evidence with all the keenness and penetration of his trained and acute intellect, but he saw no cause to believe that the court-martial had erred. In February, 1880, just a few months before his nomination to the Presidency, he wrote to his friend, General J. D. Cox:

I have been so stung by the decision of the Schofield board that it is very hard to trust my own mind to speak of it as it appeared to me.

Mr. Chairman, the argument is almost closed. The die is cast, the tale is almost told. The decree of the highest military tribunal ever assembled upon this continent, and the executed order of the martyr President, are about to be sponged out. I apprehend, judging the future by the past, that neither argument nor evidence will change the result. Though Hunter, and Hitchcock, and Garfield, and Lincoln were to come forth from their charnel house and again declare him "guilty," I am persuaded that it would change no vote on the other side of this House. Those are not the names you conjure with. Though the thousands slain, who fell by reason of Porter's blind prejudice, his unfaithfulness to his country's trust, and his insubordination to the superior whom his Government had placed over him, were to come forth from their resting place on yonder heights at Arlington and file in ghostly procession before you, and with the stony lips of death pronounce him guilty of their sacrifice, and "plead trumpet-tongued against the deep damnation of their taking off," this bill would still be passed. The fiat has gone forth that Fitz-John Porter must be "vindicated."

Ah! gentlemen, you may pass this bill. You may affix the stigma of imbecility or malignity to the court that tried him. You may restore him to the rolls of that Army made illustrious by deeds of immortal valor and purest patriotism. You may elevate him over the heads of all the gray-haired veteran officers who never swerved from the line of patriotic devotion and loyal obedience. You may erase the word "guilty" where Garfield wrote it, and inscribe in its place the words "not guilty." Where Lincoln wrote "approved," you may wipe off the word and write over it "disapproved," but it is beyond your power to vindicate Fitz-John Porter. This is not the forum nor these the voices that have the power to change

THE VERDICT OF HISTORY.

God forbid, Mr. Chairman, that I, or any of us, should stand here against an act of justice, or of mercy even, from any bitterness of a past strife, or worse yet, from any excess of party zeal. If I am conscious of my own motives, neither of these does move me. I have given to the consideration of this case long and careful study, and all the power of analysis and all the maturity of judgment of which I am possessed. In the light of that study and that analysis of evidence, I see as in a vision the events of that long sultry August afternoon. I stand at the head of Porter's column while within cannon-range the dusty-gray column of the enemy presses eagerly down across his front upon the worn-out and shattered battalions of the Union army. I hear the summons of the cannon—the same that Longstreet's men heard—calling him to the glorious fray for the cause of Union, liberty, and law. I see the reeling, wavering lines as they advance or recede with the ever-fluctuating tide of batte. I hear the shrill, far-reaching yells of the enemy as they sweep down upon our lines, and the "old glory" of the Union goes down before the resistless sweep.

It would seem as if every drop of blood in his veins, every sentiment of honor, truth, and loyalty should have impelled him with resistless power to the field of battle. But no! In listless ease, careless of the fate of his commander, his comrades, and his country, he listens to the receding roar of the conflict, and proposes to retire to Manassas without lifting hand or foot for the rescue.

Mr. Chairman, it is not for me to judge for others, not for me to say how others shall cast their votes; but as for myself, when the roll shall be called which shall decide whether the word "approved" where it was written by the hand of Lincoln shall be sponged off, my answer must be, no. [Loud and prolonged applause.]

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield me additional time. I will give it back if I have to buy it. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEGLEY. Very well.

Mr. BRAGG. Has the gentleman any additional time to yield?

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman has thirty minutes, and I will take what I need, no more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Michigan will occupy the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CUTCHEON resumed and concluded his remarks.]

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. EDEN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, having had under consideration the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, had come to no resolution thereon.

REVISION OF CUSTOMS LAWS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending a revision of the customs laws, and transmitting the opinion of certain manufacturers and merchants in connection therewith; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROADS THROUGH INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 5868) to authorize the construction and operation of railroads through the Indian Territory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. PLUMB until Friday next, on account of important business.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 637) for the erection of a public building at Hudson, N. Y.; and

A bill (S. 806) granting a pension to Mary B. Holmes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. DUNHAM. I think we might as well have the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour having arrived under the order heretofore made, the House takes a recess until 7 o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 7 o'clock p. m.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Speaker, there was probably a misapprehension as to the time when the recess should expire. The order of the House was to take a recess until 7 o'clock. In order to give gentlemen who desired to take part in the proceedings of this evening an opportunity to be present I move that we take another recess for half an hour.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly took a recess until half past 7 p. m.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the Clerk, at half past 7 p. m., called the House to order, and directed the reading of the following communication:

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK, Jr.,
Clerk House of Representatives:

I hereby designate Hon. JOHN R. EDEN to preside as Speaker pro tempore during the session this evening.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order for the evening session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Thursday, the 11th day of February, immediately after the second call of committees under clause 5, Rule XXIV, be set apart for the consideration of the bill (No. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, and that the consideration of the same be resumed at the same time thereafter on Thursday and Saturday, and Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, and that the previous question be moved Thursday, the 18th of February, at 3 o'clock p. m.; and that a recess be taken on Tuesday, February 16, from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7 o'clock p. m. of that day, and that the evening session be devoted to the consideration of House bill 67.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. BRAGG. It is said, Mr. Speaker, that broad is the road that leads to death, and thousands travel together there, while wisdom shows a narrow path, with here and there a traveler. For the benefit of those few who have been willing to gather here to-night to listen to the discussion in this case I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the further consideration of the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BRADY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BRADY. The discussion of the bill under consideration has taken quite a wide range. We have heard much of the confederate soldier and of the Union soldier and of General Grant; and following the example of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK], who has devoted a considerable portion of the time allotted to him to an able and interesting discussion with reference to his own position as to the politics of Tennessee, I trust the House will indulge me in making some personal explanation and some comments with regard to matters in the State of Virginia.

Mr. Chairman, a member of Congress who, for any purpose, would knowingly make false statements is an unfit representative of the people, and sooner or later he will lose the respect and confidence of the honest and respectable members of his own party. This House is not the place for the blatant demagogue, nor is it the proper arena for the exhibition of the wily contortionist. The characteristic Bourbon politician is so accustomed on the stump in Virginia to misleading and misinforming the people, and it is so natural for him to traduce his political opponents, that in any presence he is out of his sphere unless he wildly indulges in bitter invective and clap-trap.

Mr. Chairman, it is my earnest desire, so long as I remain a member of this body, that in all my actions, in all I say, and in all my intercourse with my fellow-members I shall not, under any circumstances, forget the honor, the courtesy, the high duties, and great responsibilities belonging to my position.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE], in discussing the report from the Committee on Naval Affairs made to the House on Friday, January 22, concerning the erasure of certain inscriptions from the dry-dock engine at the Norfolk navy-yard, made a number of statements which are not true. The gentleman appointed to succeed Mr. Lyons was not selected after a competitive examination as stated. The truth is that a Mr. Corwine was, without said examination, appointed, vice Lyons, removed. He held the position four months, and not being qualified to perform the duties thereof, he was succeeded by Mr. Carr, another Democrat, who now holds the office.

The facts are that Corwine, Democrat, incompetent, was appointed in place of Lyons, Republican, competent and twenty-three years' experience, and four months thereafter Corwine was displaced and another Democrat of Baltimore, Md., given the position, which he holds at the present time. It appears that no Democrat in Virginia could be found qualified to discharge the responsible duties of the position held so long by Mr. Lyons.

In reference to the cruel statement that Mr. Lyons was dismissed for "beastly intoxication," I have to say that I have known this worthy gentleman intimately for twenty years. It is now nearly ten months since he was removed from the office he held so long and discharged the duties thereof so faithfully, as I know from the splendid testimonials he has from a number of the most prominent and distinguished officers, line and staff, of the Navy, and never before has such a reason been assigned for his dismissal. If it were true the Democrats would have long ago proclaimed it, and I am confident that the accusation can not be sustained. It is denied by the present Chief of the Bureau of Steam-Engineering, as appears by the following letter:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STEAM-ENGINEERING,
Washington, January 28, 1886.

DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of yesterday, I have to inform you that Mr. Lyons was discharged in April, 1885. Mr. Corwine was appointed in the same month, and served as foreman until August 23, 1885. Mr. Carr, Mr. Corwine's successor, was appointed August 27, 1885, and is still at the yard as foreman of machinists.

There is no record in this bureau relating to intoxication on the part of Mr. Lyons.

Very truly, yours,
CHAS. H. LORING.

Hon. J. D. BRADY,
House of Representatives.

Mr. Lyons was removed April 27, 1885, and a few days thereafter Chief Engineer Hibbert, in charge of the steam-engineering department of the Norfolk navy-yard, gave him the following letter:

NORFOLK NAVY-YARD, VIRGINIA, May 4, 1885.

DEAR SIR: Although regretting the circumstances which terminate our official connection, I take pleasure in testifying to the marked mechanical and executive ability which has been exhibited by you in all the varying duties of the machine department of this yard during the period in which we have been associated together. In seeking elsewhere for another field of duty I heartily commend you to the favorable consideration of all with whom you may have to do, with an earnest wish that every success possible may attend your efforts.

Truly, yours,

S. D. HIBBERT,
Chief Engineer, United States Navy.

WILLIAM H. LYONS, Esq.,
Berkeley, Va.

It was stated upon the floor of the House that this gentleman held a bomb-proof position throughout the war and rendered no service to the Government. I hold in my hand a copy of the Daily Transcript, published in Portsmouth, Va., in May, 1861. The leading editorial denounces the Union Army in Virginia as the "Coming of the invaders."

In another editorial Mr. Lincoln is denounced as a traitor to the country; and I find on the list published in this same paper the name of this same man Mr. Lyons as having voted against the ordinance of secession.

From this same paper, the Portsmouth Transcript of August 5, 1861, I find that this same man Lyons was arrested and confined in jail for uttering treasonable sentiments to the Southern confederacy.

I hold in my hand a letter from ex-Secretary of the Navy Welles, showing the character of the valuable services rendered by Mr. Lyons, which is as follows:

HARTFORD, December 19, 1877.

DEAR SIR: I have your letter of the 12th inst., reminding me of the trying days of 1861 and 1862. I do not forget, though years have passed, that I was kept advised by you and others of the affairs at the navy-yard at Norfolk at the time of the evacuation, and of the condition of the Merrimac after she was raised, and from time to time as the work of refitting and armoring her, as the work progressed, preparatory to her descent and assault upon the fleet in Hampton Roads. The value and importance of the information I received were great, and was furnished at no small risk to yourself. Of present anticipated difficulties which threaten you, whether personal or political, I know nothing, and prefer not to participate in them; nor do I wish to intrude myself voluntarily upon the present Secretary of the Navy, who perhaps might take exception to any interference from me. Should he wish any facts from me in your case they will be cheerfully given, and you are at liberty to refer him to me.

This letter addressed to yourself may answer your purpose.

Very respectfully,

GIDEON WELLES.

W. H. LYONS, Esq.,
Superintendent of Machinery, Navy-Yard, Norfolk.

I also invite attention to the following letter of the late Major-General Wool, of the United States Army, to Mr. Lyons:

TROY, N. Y., December 3, 1864.

SIR: I have this morning received your letter of the 29th ult. calling my attention to the information furnished me in the spring of 1862 by you of the intended attack of the iron-clad steamer Merrimac on our ships of war, at that time in Hampton Roads. The information was written on cloth, as you stated, and concealed under the lining of the coat of the person who brought it. At that time I considered it highly important, but I do not now remember the name of the person who brought me the information, and I have no memorandum to refresh my memory.

Col. T. J. Cram, my aid at that time, is now at Detroit.

Very respectfully, yours,

JOHN E. WOOL, U. S. A.

W. H. LYONS,
United States Navy-Yard, Norfolk, Va.

And I also ask special attention to the following letter from Commodore Livingston, commandant of the navy-yard, to Rear-Admiral Joseph Smith, showing the character of Mr. Lyons's services during the late war:

UNITED STATES NAVY-YARD, NORFOLK, August 31, 1863.

SIR: I inclose herewith a letter from Mr. Lyons in relation to the working of the dock engine. It gives me great pleasure to state that Mr. Lyons has been as indefatigable in his attention to this as in all his other duties in the yard, and to him beyond all others I have been indebted for aid in my duties here.

I had no knowledge of him before I came to this yard; I understand that he performed valuable service in giving information to the authorities at Fortress Monroe concerning the Merrimac before her movement to destroy our vessels in the James River. He is very attentive to his duties and seldom dines out of the yard, and takes more pleasure in his profession than in politics; his work is spoken of well by the officers who have been here, and he keeps his men to their work. Such a man is valuable to the Government. I understand there is a great effort on the part of some dissatisfied politicians to have this most worthy man removed. Why, I know not. His salary has been $3 per day, and I consider his services have been worth far more to the Government. He has been building up a reputation for himself, as well as doing his duty. And I hope when the engine has been in complete working order you will appoint competent engineers to examine and report the manner in which the work has been done, and, if satisfactory, you will use your valuable influence to have justice done this worthy mechanic.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JNO. W. LIVINGSTON,
Commodore, Commanding.

Rear-Admiral JOSEPH SMITH,
Chief of Bureau of Yards and Docks, Washington, D. C.

I now introduce in the order following letters from Chief Engineers Robie and Dade, late Chief of Bureau Shock, Chief Engineer Stewart, Rear-Admiral Davis, Rear-Admiral Cooper, Chief Engineers Melville, Williamson, and Winans, Captain Glassin, and the present Rear-Admiral Livingston, all showing the splendid record, character, and standing of Mr. Lyons, who has been so outrageously traduced:

CHIEF ENGINEER'S OFFICE, NAVY-YARD,
New York, June 20, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I have a letter stating that you are about to be suspended unless you can prove that your services in the navy-yard have been of importance during the war and since that time.

As I had some duty at that navy-yard during the war in repairing the Dictator's massive machinery and in fitting torpedo rafts for use on the Southern coast, I take pleasure in saying that your services on those occasions were of importance, and since then, while I was the chief engineer in charge of the steam-engineering department of that navy-yard, from 1874 until 1877, and you were the foreman and superintendent of machinists, I found you equal to every emergency, capable and zealous in the discharge of all the duty assigned you.

With best wishes, I am yours, truly,

R. D. ROBIE,
Chief Engineer, U. S. N.

Mr. WILLIAM H. LYONS,
Superintendent of Machinery, Navy-Yard, Norfolk, Va.

NAVY-YARD, NORFOLK, January 26, 1881.

Mr. W. H. Lyons, superintendent of machinery at this yard, has been employed in the bureau of steam engineering here for nineteen years, about seven years of which time his conduct came under my observation, and I can say that he performed his duties faithfully and ably.

F. C. DADE,
Chief Engineer, United States Navy.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING,
Washington, May 7, 1877.

SIR: Mr. W. H. Lyons is hereby reinstated as superintendent of machinery at Norfolk navy-yard, as recommended by Chief Engineer Robie, under date of the 4th instant, and "approved and earnestly recommended" by yourself, the same to date from the 1st instant.

Respectfully,

W. H. SHOCK, Chief of Bureau.

Commodore J. B. CREIGHTON, U. S. N.,
Commandant Navy-Yard, Norfolk, Va.

CHIEF ENGINEER'S OFFICE, NAVY-YARD,
Norfolk, Va., June 14, 1872.

SIR: It affords me much pleasure to state that since I have been on duty at this navy-yard (the past three years) the intelligence, ability, attention, and care bestowed in the conduct of the work and the mechanical knowledge displayed by you merit and receive my strongest approbation.

Hoping you may retain for many years the position you now so ably fill,

I am, yours, respectfully,

H. H. STEWART,
Chief Engineer, U. S. N.

W. H. LYONS,
Master Machinist, Navy-Yard, Norfolk, Va.

UNITED STATES NAVY-YARD, NORFOLK, VA., May 31, 1872.

SIR: I beg leave to say to the Department that Mr. William H. Lyons, the master machinist of this yard, has always commanded my highest respect and confidence both officially and privately, and respectfully recommend him to its most favorable consideration.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. H. DAVIS,
Rear-Admiral, Commanding Navy-Yard and Station, Norfolk, Va.

Hon. GEO. M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy,
Navy Department, Washington, D. C.

EXECUTIVE OFFICER'S OFFICE, NAVY-YARD,
Portsmouth, Va., May 31, 1872.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request of this date, it affords me great pleasure to certify to your strict attention to your duties as master machinist of this yard. Your gentlemanly conduct and willingness at all times to act in concert with the authorities of the yard has made you many friends among the officers.

Very respectfully,

G. H. COOPER,
Captain, United States Navy.

WILLIAM H. LYONS, Esq.,
Master Machinist, Navy-Yard, Norfolk, Va.

UNITED STATES STEAMSHIP LANCASTER,
Off Norfolk, Va., September 8, 1869.

DEAR SIR: I was a little surprised this morning to hear of your intended change in office if possible. The service you have rendered the Government as master machinist of the Norfolk navy-yard should be better recompensed than an appointment in the revenue service as you speak of. I am sure no master machinist of any of our yards can turn out as much, and done in as good manner, as I have seen turned out under your supervision. I have been here as chief of three different ships and have had work done for all of them. One, the Penobscot, in particular, after undergoing thorough repairs at Washington, was unable to go to sea until you laid your master-hand upon her.

But if you are still determined upon going into the revenue service, you have my best wishes for your success, and I know the Government could not confer an appointment upon a more deserving and competent engineer.

I have the honor, sir, to be, yours, truly,

GEO. H. MELVILLE,
First Assistant Engineer, U. S. N.

Mr. W. H. LYONS.

U. S. S. R. R. CUYLER,
Gosport Navy-Yard, Virginia, March 29, 1865.

SIR: Having been personally and professionally acquainted with you as the master machinist of Gosport navy-yard, I take pleasure in bearing testimony to your moral character and qualifications (professionally) to superintend or conduct the machine business in all its branches.

Hoping to hear of your future success and happiness, I remain,

Yours, truly,

J. D. WILLIAMSON,
Acting Chief Engineer, U. S. Navy.

WILLIAM H. LYONS,
Master Machinist, Gosport Navy-Yard.

U. S. S. SHENANDOAH, Gosport Navy-Yard, November 21, 1864.

SIR: I beg leave to tender you my thanks for the manner and dispatch you have completed the repairs on this ship during the few months I have been connected with her, and cheerfully bear testimony to your mechanical skill and your superior knowledge of engineering, both mechanical and civil.

Hoping you success in whatever you may undertake,

I remain, yours, truly,

U. WINANS,
Act'g Ch'f Eng'r, U. S. N.

WILLIAM H. LYONS,
M. M., Gosport Navy-Yard.

OFFICE NORTH ATLANTIC SQUADRON,
United States Navy-Yard, Norfolk, December 5, 1864.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to introduce to you Mr. W. H. Lyons, the master machinist at this yard, and a gentleman admirably adapted to execute with promptitude and energy the work in his department.

I say with confidence that Mr. Lyons stands remarkably high in his profession and with the officers and men employed in this yard.

His untiring zeal and devotion to the Union of the States makes him stand in that noble position in which you are and which you ever will be.

I have the honor, general, to be,

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN J. GLASSIN,
Commander United States Navy.

General SHIPLEY,
Military Governor of Norfolk, and commanding the Military District of Virginia and North Carolina.

NEW YORK, April 24, 1885.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received yours of the 20th instant. Its contents brought to mind many things of the past; but so many years have gone by that my memory is much shaken, for you must remember that I am now an old man. Therefore I wish you would write me again, and let me know what became of you after I left the yard and what you have been doing since and how now employed. I well remember how much your patriotism, energy, and industry did to help the Government when enemies were numerous and friends few. I do not believe that a letter to the Secretary of the Navy would aid you as much as a general one "to whom it may concern." However, write me again, and we will see what can be done for you. I am glad to hear from you, and that you are among the living, and, I hope, prosperous and happy.

Yours, respectfully,

JNO. W. LIVINGSTON,
Rear-Admiral United States Navy.

W. H. LYONS, Navy-Yard, Norfolk.

The gentleman also states that "during Arthur's administration the postmaster at Portsmouth, who was a Union soldier, twice wounded and twice promoted for gallantry, was removed at the dictation of WILLIAM MAHONE."

Mr. Chairman, the other side of the House loudly cheered and laughed over this wonderful sally of their champion. I declare to the House that the statement is not true. The postmaster at Portsmouth was not removed. So says the First Assistant Postmaster-General.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 26, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of this date I would state that the commission of the postmaster at Portsmouth, Va., will expire on June 20, 1888. Mr. Staples served his full term of four years.

Yours, very truly,

A. E. STEVENSON.

Hon. JAMES D. BRADY, House.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 27, 1886.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your verbal inquiries of this date I beg to submit the following statements: First, the commission of Robert G. Staples as postmaster at Portsmouth, Va., expired January 26, 1884; second, Ambrose H. Lindsay was appointed as Staples's successor June 20, 1884; third, the cause of such change was the expiration of the commission of said Staples; fourth, the name of the present postmaster at Portsmouth is Ambrose H. Lindsay.

Very respectfully,

A. E. STEVENSON,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. J. D. BRADY,
House of Representatives.

He was not "a Union soldier, twice wounded and twice promoted for gallantry."

This postmaster, although an active sympathizer with the Bourbon Democratic party of Virginia and a bitter opponent of the Republican administration, was permitted under the administration of President Arthur to serve out his full term. He was never "wounded" or "promoted for gallantry."

The gentleman has gratuitously introduced the name of WILLIAM MAHONE into this debate. Mr. Speaker, the name "Mahone" in my State makes the average Bourbon Democrat foam and splutter. It frightens the Democratic bosses and strikes terror into the hearts of their clans. We had a mild exhibition of the effect of that name in this House the other day.

With regard to the Federal patronage in Virginia under President Arthur's administration, no man in public life has been more unjustly assailed than General MAHONE. I assert that during his whole term as Senator no person holding a Federal Presidential office has been removed therefrom upon his recommendation or suggestion. The gentleman's party now have the books. Let him examine the record and contradict me if he can. I also ask the gentleman to name the Union soldiers and sailors who have been removed from office in Virginia by General MAHONE. He can not show a single instance, except one, where a Union soldier was appointed to a minor office held by a Union sailor, and very soon after this change the Union sailor was given another position.

As the gentleman has not confined himself to the question embraced in the committee's report, and explored the Post-Office Department in search of ammunition with which to kill MAHONE and fire the Democratic heart, I will call his attention to three removals of ex-Union soldiers, not embraced in the long list I propose to give of those dismissed from the navy-yard. I refer to Col. H. de B. Clay, the department commander of the Grand Army of the Republic of Virginia, who was removed as collector of customs at West Point, and Baker P. Lee, ex-confederate, appointed; to Col. J. B. Raulston, who was removed from the position of collector of internal revenue; and to Mr. Spencer, who for many years, under the gentleman's own eye, was a faithful and competent deputy collector of customs at Richmond. Col. Clay and Mr. Spencer, as prominent Grand Army men, interested themselves in the good work of raising funds for the establishment of a home at Richmond, Va., for disabled and poor ex-confederates, and they were both rewarded by being kicked out of the little positions they held under the Government they fought to save by the influence of the member from the Richmond district and his fellow-Democrats.

The gentleman has presumed to introduce the great name of General Grant in this discussion. He forgets that MAHONE, Mosby, and Longstreet were the friends of General Grant, that he was their friend, that the great confederate leaders and their followers have accepted the results of the war in good faith, that they are now Republicans, and that the Republican party will not allow any man, be he high or low in its councils, to violate the law of the land which gives the preference in Government employment to the Union soldiers disabled in the service of their country. What is that law?

SEC. 1754. Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty, shall be preferred for appointment to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices.

Does the gentleman believe if that great hero General Grant were alive that he would approve of the discharge from the Norfolk navy-yard of one-armed, wounded, disabled veterans of his own army in order to make room for rampant Democratic "offensive" partisans who were in the confederate service during the war? Ah, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman even goes to the bedside of the dying leader at Mount McGregor and he draws patriotic inspiration therefrom. I would suggest it would have been better for him to have turned his attention to his own party friends and his own party's organ at his home during the dying days of General Grant, for in the Richmond Dispatch (the Sunday issue) at that time conspicuously appeared a communication charging General Grant with feigning sickness. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it does not become the gentleman to refer to General Grant in order to bolster up the cause he represents in this House, for General Grant has forcibly condemned that cause in Virginia, as will appear by the letter which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, October 4, 1881.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 10th of September was duly received, but not answered at that time because of my absence from the city. I was busy on my return, and have only just come across your letter again. As a rule I am averse to taking any part in political matters outside of the State in which I reside, except where they become national in their character. I do regard the present contest in Virginia as being national, and therefore justifying me and all other lovers of their country, without regard to section, in expressing an opinion. In conversations on the subject I have openly and frequently expressed my sympathy with General MAHONE and the Readjusters, so-called, in their present contest.

I have never been a sympathizer with repudiation in any form, but in the present instance the virtue claimed by the Democracy of the State of Virginia I regard as all assumed. They have had control of the State for quite a number of years, and as I understand the politics of the State, they not only have made no effort to pay the interest upon their State debt, but they have prohibited taxation beyond a certain percentage, which looks to a determination to pay no part, principal or interest. In other words, while they are in favor of acknowledging the whole debt, principal and interest, they are opposed to paying any part of either. Hence, on this point between the two, I much prefer those who are willing to acknowledge as much of the debt as they think they can pay, and who want to bind themselves to provide for the interest and the acknowledged principal when it becomes due.

But in this contest there is a much more important issue at stake. I regard the success of what is called the Readjusters as working the emancipation of all the voters of the State, and when that is secured, it is a matter of much less difference which party succeeds. It is patent to my mind that at present and for some years back, while there is an acknowledgment of the right of the colored citizen to vote, there is a determination that his vote shall not decide the success of a political party. When this freedom of the ballot is given to all legal voters Virginia will be in a condition to invite immigration of people who will add greatly to the resources as well as to the population of the State. The interests of all citizens will then become so great that no fear need be entertained of bad government, no matter which political party may have the ascendency.

Truly, yours,

U. S. GRANT.

Col. JAMES D. BRADY,
Chairman Republican State Executive Committee.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. Chairman, were it not for the patriotism and valor of the Union soldiers "the house of our fathers" would have been destroyed, and the gentleman would not to-day be a member of the Congress of these United States.

We of the victorious side cordially welcome them back to the old home which we preserved and saved for them. We greatly rejoice over their return; they are equals in the nation's councils, and we are glad of their determination to stay, but they must not forget that we are still a part of the household, and have some rights which we propose to properly assert in "our fathers' house."

Mr. Chairman, I have no respect for that sickly sentimentality which gives credence to the assertion that because we on this side of the House demand fair treatment, justice, and enforcement of the law for Union soldiers we have raised the sectional cry. Perish the thought that a majority of the American people will ever regard the demand in Congress for the enforcement of the just and legal rights of the men who saved the nation as unpatriotic or impolitic.

Another statement of the gentleman is not true. That is his reference to the circular "bearing the name of WILLIAM MAHONE as chairman and JAMES D. BRADY as secretary."

Mr. Chairman, I never held such a position, political or otherwise, in connection with General MAHONE, and no such circular as described was ever issued either by General MAHONE or myself. Every circular issued during the political campaigns in Virginia by General MAHONE or myself was published and distributed, and I here again challenge him to produce any such circular.

Mr. Chairman, in regard to the resolutions of inquiry introduced in the House of Representatives by the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], calling on the Secretary of the Navy for information concerning the removal of certain Union war inscriptions from the dry-dock engine and from cannons, and the dismissal of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors, in violation of the United States Revised Statutes, at the Norfolk navy-yard, I desire to state that I never saw said resolutions before they were introduced and read in this House. I had nothing to do with their preparation or introduction, and I am not responsible for bringing the matters therein referred to before the House. The subject is, nevertheless, before Congress, and in the discharge of a duty I feel that I owe to my comrades of the late war, and with the desire of perpetuating the honorable mementoes and glorious memories of their heroic and successful struggle for the maintenance of this great nation I propose to give a statement of such facts bearing upon the subject as are within my own knowledge and have been furnished me by men of high character and standing.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a political question, nor is it a question of party patronage at the Norfolk navy-yard or elsewhere in Virginia. It is not whether Democrats or Republicans should fill the offices under the General Government at the Norfolk navy-yard, but it is the great, the all-important question of good faith on the part of this nation to its noble defenders. True, the Democratic party and its "committee on spoils" of the old Commonwealth have had full and complete sway over the Federal offices in our State since the advent of the present administration, and it can not be denied that during the past nine months all the collectors of internal revenue, the United States marshals, district attorneys, hundreds of postmasters, deputy collectors, clerks, inspectors, gaugers, messengers, mail-agents, storekeepers, watchmen, and other faithful public servants of the Government have been unceremoniously dismissed by the present "reform" administration and the vacancies thus created filled by the appointment of active Democrats of no experience whatever in the public service. Yet I will not complain of or tarry upon this theme, so prolific of valuable information for the honest civil-service reformers. I come direct to the subject under consideration.

Mr. Chairman, in June last I addressed a letter to a United States Senator of the North, which was published in many newspapers of the country, and in said letter I made the following declaration, which I believe I can prove to the satisfaction of any honest court or jury in the land, namely:

> The climax of persecution for opinion's sake is that of the Bourbon Democracy at the Norfolk navy-yard during the months of March, April, and May. I venture the assertion that since the foundation of this Government to the present time no such outrageous proscription has been practiced toward mechanics, laborers, clerks, and writers. Valuable information and services to the Government immediately after the reoccupation of the navy-yard after its abandonment by the confederates, gallant services in the Union Army and Navy during the rebellion, honorable wounds received upon the battlefields in the desperate struggle for the maintenance of the Union, years of experience in the various mechanical branches, bodily injuries received by mechanics and laborers in the performance of Government work, old, skilled, and valuable mechanics and laborers, all are cruelly disregarded, all shamefully forgotten, all willfully ignored in order to make places for hungry and thirsty Bourbon Democrats.

The men employed at the Norfolk navy-yard, with but few exceptions, on account of their long and faithful services, their character and standing, their superior fitness, their meritorious conduct, felt secure in their places, and as a class had little to do with politics and were indifferent as to the political influences at Washington, because nearly all of them were appointed upon the recommendation of United States naval officers in charge of the different departments. Within three months after the inauguration of the present administration sixty-two of these faithful and experienced officials were removed. Here are the names and a brief statement of the record of some of the Union soldiers and sailors and loyal citizens who have been dismissed from the Government service at that navy-yard since the 4th of March last, in violation of the following United States revised statutes:

> SEC. 1543. The persons employed at the several navy-yards to superintend the mechanical departments, and heretofore known as master mechanics, master carpenters, master joiners, master blacksmiths, master boiler-makers, master sail-makers, master plumbers, master painters, master calkers, master masons, master boat-builders, master spar-makers, master block-makers, master laborers, and the superintendents of rope-walks shall be men skilled in their several duties and appointed from civil life, and shall not be appointed from the officers of the Navy.
> SEC. 1544. Laborers shall be employed in the several navy-yards by the proper officers in charge with reference to skill and efficiency, and without regard to other considerations.
> SEC. 1545. Salaries shall not be paid to any employés in any of the navy-yards except those who are designated in the estimates. All other persons shall receive a per diem compensation for the time during which they may be actually employed.
> SEC. 1546. No officer or employé of the Government shall require or request any workingman in any navy-yard to contribute or pay any money for political purposes, nor shall any workingman be removed or discharged for political opinion; and any officer or employé of the Government who shall offend against the provisions of this section shall be dismissed from the service of the United States.

A. J. Hopkins, engine tender, bureau of construction and repairs, appointed in 1869, upon the recommendation of Naval Constructor Webb; was in 1861 arrested at Portsmouth, Va., and confined in Libby prison for his loyalty to the Government; served in the Union Navy during the rebellion; sixteen years' experience in the yard; an honored and respected citizen; removed May 4 last, and Virginius Freeman, of the confederate navy, appointed. This Mr. Freeman was in the Union Navy before the war, which he left to join the confederate cause.

W. N. Eaton, store clerk, bureau of steam engineering, appointed in 1870 upon the recommendation of Chief Engineer Newell, United States Navy; ex-Union officer; served gallantly during the war, and has a splendid record; twenty years' experience and constant employment in a clerical capacity at the navy-yard; was removed May 29, 1885, and William Easby appointed.

S. B. Kenney, store clerk, bureau of yards and docks, appointed in 1870 upon the recommendation of Civil Engineer Speer, United States Navy; ex-Union officer in the United States Navy, serving faithfully during the whole of the late war; twenty years' constant employment and experience in clerical duties at the yard; was removed May 7, 1885, and E. A. Butt appointed.

Charles M. Clark, civil engineer's clerk, bureau of yards and docks, appointed in 1870 upon the recommendation of Civil Engineer Speer; was taken prisoner and confined in Libby prison while attending Union wounded on the battlefield at first Bull Run; served in the Union Army; one of the most competent clerks in the Government service; was removed May 7, 1885, and J. B. King, ex-confederate soldier, appointed.

All loyal to the Government during the war, have since the 4th of March last been removed, and the places thus made vacant, in most instances, given to those who served in the confederate army or navy.

Mr. Chairman, it appears that Commodore Truxton, the naval officer assigned by Secretary Whitney to the command of the navy-yard at Norfolk, soon after assuming charge, issued an order removing a certain plate from the dry-dock engine upon which was the following inscription:

Destroyed by the rebels in 1862.
Rebuilt by U. S. Government in 1863.
J. W. Livingston, Commandant.
W. H. Lyons, Sup't of Machinery.

The plate containing the foregoing inscription, placed there by orders of Rear-Admiral Smith, Chief of Bureau of Yards and Docks, remained on the dry-dock engine from 1863 until said removal by Commodore Truxton, which action aroused the old Union and loyal sentiments of Mr. Lyons, and making some unfavorable comments thereon, he was shortly thereafter dismissed, as I have shown by the official records.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that no denial will be made of the fact that the inscription above referred to, which for nearly twenty years remained upon the dry-dock engine at the Norfolk navy-yard, was removed therefrom very soon after the coming into power of the present Democratic administration. I know that it has been removed. A pettifogging statement has been made that the dry-dock at the Norfolk navy-yard was not destroyed. Everybody knows that an effort was made to completely destroy the dry-dock; and if the efforts were not successful, it is certain that the dry-dock was rendered unfit for use and that the dry-dock engine upon which this inscription was borne was destroyed. The official records of the Navy Department show this to be true.

I have, Mr. Chairman, given the names, the services, and the records of those honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who, in violation of law, have been dismissed from the Government service at the Norfolk navy-yard under the present Democratic administration.

Mr. Chairman, the propositions involved in this matter are simple and plain.

First. Shall the inscriptions of the patriotic and heroic deeds of the soldiers and sailors of the Union Army upon the public works and property and monuments belonging to the Government be obliterated by the present Democratic administration without protest in the American Congress on the part of those who represent the loyal sentiment of the country?

Second. Shall wounded and disabled ex-Union soldiers and sailors with honorable records, long and faithful services to the Government, be unceremoniously dismissed by a Democratic administration, in plain violation of law, in order to make place for inexperienced, unreconstructed ex-confederate Bourbon Democrats, without an earnest protest on the part of their comrades who served with them, who fought with them in the dark days of their country's trials and dangers?

Mr. Chairman, I yield to no man who fought on the Union side during the late war in kindly feelings toward the ex-confederate soldiers, and upon this point I need only refer to my public acts during the past twenty years. An examination of the public records of the country and of the newspapers of my own State during this long period will show that in season and sometimes out of season I have always come to the front and defended the confederate soldiers against unjust assaults and untruthful accusations. My first act in Congress was to introduce a bill removing all political disability:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 6, 1886.

Read twice, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRADY introduced the following bill:

A bill for the removal of all disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That all disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States upon persons who have engaged in the insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof, be, and they are hereby, removed.

Ten years ago, nearly, Federal Memorial Day, May 30, 1876, I delivered the address at the Yorktown (Va.) National Cemetery in response to the invitation of the Grand Army of the Republic of Virginia. I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to be read an extract from that address, as published in the Norfolk (Va.) Landmark, June 1, 1876.

I am not unmindful that I speak upon Virginia soil, nor do I forget the side that her brave sons espoused during the late war. To my mind sad indeed is it to realize the fact that Virginians, who did so much to make the Union great, beloved at home and respected abroad, should have fought so hard to destroy that same Union. But the war is over, the confederate cause is dead, the Southerners have returned to the homes of their fathers, there to remain; and we of the victorious side, instead of censuring or condemning them, should welcome them back, extending the right hand of fellowship, and ask them that as we forget, that they forget the bitterness of the past and to unite with us in every proper effort to benefit our country.

The war has demoralized and corrupted our people, North and South, to an alarming extent, and in my judgment the salvation of our country depends upon the purification of our governments, national, State, and local. This is a most difficult undertaking, and it requires the combined wisdom and skill of our best statesmen to accomplish the task. We who wore the blue have only feelings of kindness and words of praise for those who wore the gray. The herculean works of valor and gallantry displayed by the ragged, sore-foot, half-fed Southern soldiers upon many of the desperate battlefields of the war have justly won for them the respect and admiration of the civilized world, and most assuredly we their brothers, Americans, should be and we are proud of such deeds and of such noble men. All that we ask of those who wore the gray is to feel toward us, act toward us as we feel and act toward them. Let us, soldiers of the Union and confederate armies, be friends.

These, Mr. Chairman, are my sentiments now, and I have ever been for cordially extending to the ex-confederate soldiers all rights and privileges guaranteed by law under our Government to all its citizens, but when I know that my wounded and disabled comrades of the Union Army have been dismissed from Federal employment, when I know that skillful mechanics and hard-working laborers, those who have suffered indescribable persecution on account of their loyalty and devotion to their country, are shamefully proscribed and deprived of the work they so much need to enable them to obtain bread for their wives and little ones—and all this under the Government they saved—in order that ex-confederates may be given the preference in employment, I hang my head in sorrow, and ask myself, can it be true that the Union side was triumphant in the late war? In all fairness and candor I submit to the calm, the unprejudiced judgment of ex-confederates on the floor of Congress that in employment under the Federal Government disabled ex-Union soldiers and sailors, being qualified, are entitled to the preference. It is the law of the land, and the repeated declaration of almost every national convention of both the great political parties since the close of the war.

Mr. Chairman, there are two classes in my State, both of which are despised and traduced with a malignity and ferociousness which is indescribable, and can not be imagined by the intelligent and patriotic people of the North. I have the great honor of belonging to one of these classes. I am a Virginian who was loyal to my country during the late war. I fought in the Union Army from Bull Run to Appomattox.

This fact to-day in my State, more than twenty years after the termination of the war, is regarded as the most heinous of crimes and offenses against Virginia and Virginians, and which will never be, I fear, forgotten or forgiven; certainly not by the party which at present dominates the State. The men who fought the hardest, who did the most for the destruction of the Union, who yet glory in the confederate cause, and who bitterly hate those Southern men who were loyal to the Union during the war, are to-day the heroes, the patriots, the leaders in Virginia of the Bourbon Democracy.

There is the other class, which, if it were possible, are more despised than that to which I belong. It is composed of ex-confederates, now numbering, I am happy to say, more than fifty thousand brave and true men, those who have accepted the results of the war for the Union in good faith and have identified themselves with the Republican party. They are most shamefully, most cruelly denounced as "outcasts" and "deserters," and their alleged "treason" to the confederate cause since the end of the war is made more than odious. Proclamations of outlawry are issued against both classes, and only a few days ago one of the leading Democratic newspapers of the State editorially announced that we deserved to be lynched.

Mr. Chairman, my position in this matter shall not be misunderstood. I speak plainly, in order that there may be no misconstruction or misrepresentation of my remarks. I do not censure the people of Virginia. The Bourbon Democracy and the people of Virginia are not, thank God, one and the same. I do censure, I do condemn that intolerant party at present ruling and ruining Virginia, because it believes in, teaches, and puts into practice the horrible doctrine of hatred and ill-will toward every one who dares to differ with it; because under its baneful edicts many of Virginia's brightest intellects, many of her most renowned soldiers and distinguished citizens, many of her most prosperous merchants and successful bankers, many of her most industrious mechanics and thrifty farmers—no matter how pure and honorable their character—since their identification with the Republican party have been shamefully traduced, maliciously slandered, willfully misrepresented, and most outrageously ostracised; because it approves of the removal of honorable Union war inscriptions at the Norfolk navy-yard and elsewhere, while it labors hard to perpetuate the memory and deeds of the confederate cause, and because it boldly defends and upholds the violators of the law giving the preference to ex-Union soldiers and sailors in employment under the General Government.

Mr. Chairman, unfortunately for the peace, happiness, and prosperity of the people of Virginia and for the country, this bitter, unreconstructed Bourbon Democratic party now governs the old Commonwealth; and, supported as it is by the power of the present Democratic administration, it publicly boasts, through its newspapers and its leaders, of the recently acquired right to tear down Union war inscriptions and to dismiss from the United States Government workshops honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors. I fear that the loyal men of the nation will, when it is too late, realize the full extent of the power and influence under the Government of this dangerous, this most insidious, party, under the influences of which Old Virginia—the home of Washington, Jefferson, Henry, Madison, and Monroe—is surely, alas! sadly, taking its position backward in the Union of States. It has driven from her borders thousands of the hardy, industrious, and enterprising sons of the North and millions of dollars of capital.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BRADY. Certainly.

Mr. BRUMM. I understand the gentleman to say that certain memorials inscribed upon the engine of the dry-dock in the Norfolk navy-yard had been removed. What I want to know is whether that is the memorial that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] stated here the other day had been removed and the removal of which I understood the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] to deny?

Mr. BRADY. It is the same, sir. I do not think that will be denied.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the time until after the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] shall have spoken.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, there does not seem to be any one to whom I can yield the time just given me by the gentleman from Kansas [laughter], so I must endeavor to utilize it myself, although I had no expectation of making any remarks upon the pending bill.

I would be glad if the proposition before us were to forgive, to sponge out the record that Fitz-John Porter has made. If the pending bill were one extending amnesty to him I should be glad to vote for it, because I believe that he has suffered perhaps far beyond what he should have suffered for the crimes he committed against his country. I am not one of those who place him in the catalogue of traitors. I believe, as I think most of the people of this country believe, that on that occasion he was moved and instigated by a spirit of insubordination, which led him into doing that which perhaps in a month, yea, perhaps in a day, he regretted.

If Fitz-John Porter is innocent of any offense against his country, as some profess to believe, then he is the most unfortunate of men. I do not believe he was a coward, but if not a coward then he was willfully disobedient from the very moment he came under the orders of General Pope until the 30th day of August, when the tragedy ended. On the 27th day of August, two days before the first battle was fought, we find him carping and complaining, criticising and finding fault with his commander-in-chief. And yet I am free to say, sir, that if we could separate what General Porter did from what he had previously said, if we could consider his action alone and not his words, we might induce ourselves to believe that he was not guilty of any offense against his country. Gentlemen sneer when we say that General Porter was disloyal to his commander, as if that had nothing to do with fealty to country.

They make a wide distinction, and I concede that there may be a great distinction, between the two cases in general; but when a commander in the field orders a subordinate officer to do a certain duty in a perilous hour, then that subordinate can not be disloyal to his commander without being at the same time disloyal to his country. There can be no distinction in such a case as that. An officer must either do his duty as ordered, or he must be regarded as disloyal to his flag for the time being. The fact that the commanding general does not happen to suit him has nothing to do with the question. If he thinks that the commander has less brains than himself, that is no reason why he should fail to exercise all his own capacity in defending the flag under which he serves. If his commander be weak and lacking in capacity, the obligation is all the greater upon the subordinate to bring to bear, for the benefit of his flag, all the ability and all the valor which he possesses.

Now, sir, on the 27th of August we find General Porter writing letters, complaining and criticising what had been done and what was about to be done, telling how little was known about the situation, and at the same time exposing how little he knew about the situation himself. The very first order he received from his new commander he disobeyed. For that disobedience, which is practically admitted, a great variety of excuses were offered two years ago in this Chamber. It was stated here by one gentleman at least that a terrific thunder-storm, amounting almost to a cyclone, prevented his moving as ordered; but now that terrific thunder-storm has declined to a mist. According to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. HAYNES] who opens the case for General Porter, that terrible thunder-storm has shriveled into a mist, and if the real truth had been stated it would have dwindled to a gentle dew. [Laughter.] There was absolutely no storm that night. No man who was in that army, no man who marched either toward the enemy or from the enemy on that occasion, dare stand up in this presence and say that there was a storm. But it seemed to be necessary two years ago that a thunder-storm should be manufactured here in order to excuse Fitz-John Porter and acquit him of his offense against his country and his kind.

It is said there was great stupidity on the part of General Pope; that his idea of "bagging Jackson" at that time was ridiculous. Because Jackson was not "bagged," because what Pope had determined to do was not done, gentlemen say, "Oh, that was so stupid; it was so far beyond the possibilities." But Fitz-John Porter was nine miles away in the hour when the "bagging" was to be accomplished; he was nine miles from the point where he was expected to be; and when Porter finally reached that point the enemy which was expected to be there had gone, and how could he be "bagged?" Because there was a failure under these circumstances no inference can be drawn that if the orders of General Pope had been obeyed success would not have crowned the effort. But whether failure or success follow, the duty of the soldier in the hour a battle is pending is to obey.

But Porter, instead of being at the point designated at daylight, was not there until 10 o'clock. That is failure No. 1 to obey orders. Then came the great misfortune that befell our arms, growing, as I believe, out of the failure of Porter to obey orders on the 29th. I refer to the orders sent to Porter personally and the joint order sent to him and General McDowell.

Arriving at Dawkin's Branch, where he should have prepared for battle on the 29th day of August, Porter then and there made manifest to all the world a purpose on his part not to fight the enemy. And here is where the gentleman from Alabama makes his great mistake. His whole argument to-day, which was able, was based on the supposition that General Porter was in the presence, and believed he was in the presence, of twenty-five thousand of the enemy. Hence the gentleman argues it would have been a piece of hardihood, it would have been a waste of men and material—mere recklessness—to make an attack upon an enemy thus numerous. Now, I undertake to say that there is not a particle of evidence anywhere in the case going to show that General Porter at the time he halted his command at Dawkin's Branch had any knowledge whatever of the number of the enemy in his front—not one scintilla of evidence.

Mr. WHEELER. You were an officer in the Army?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Yes, in the Army; but not an officer.

Mr. WHEELER. And do you say it is possible for a military commander to be in the presence of twenty-five thousand of the enemy without knowing it?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I do not say that. I do not say a general can be in the presence of the enemy and not know there is an enemy. But I say it is a very easy thing, and a very common thing, to be in the presence of an enemy and not know the number of that enemy. I think that is the case almost every time a battle is fought. But I say now that it matters nothing whether that army was composed of twenty-five thousand men or twenty-five men. The obligation or duty resting upon Fitz-John Porter was just as strong as if he had believed the number of the enemy to be exactly that which he himself commanded. In fact I believe, and I think you yourself believe, that the duty was even greater, the responsibility of obeying the order rose even higher if he knew that the enemy consisted of twenty-five thousand men, because then it was all the more important he should hold those twenty-five thousand men so that they could not be hurled against the army of Pope, then in a deadly conflict with General Jackson.

Mr. WHEELER. Will you be kind enough to read anything from the record showing that General Pope ordered Porter to make an attack upon any troops in front of him prior to 4.30 in the afternoon?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That, with all deference to the gentleman, is simply a quibble.

Mr. WHEELER. I assert that no such order was ever given, and I call upon you to read it.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Well, I am not here to read orders.

I have ten minutes of time which I can not use to hunt orders read here already a dozen times over. I know that Porter was ordered there for the purpose of attacking the enemy. He was ordered in the first place to move to Gainesville.

Mr. WHEELER. Toward Gainesville.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But was never ordered to stop at all until he had made connection with the other portions of the army. Neither of those things had been accomplished up to the time he made his halt at Dawkin's Branch.

Mr. WHEELER. Do you assert that by moving farther forward toward Gainesville he would have made connection with troops on his right? I assert—I assert confidently—that to have gone beyond where he was would have placed him farther from any connection with any troops on his right.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Farther from the connection with Union forces, but nearer the enemy. And if you say he had an alternative—if you say he might have obeyed one order or the other, that is, join with our forces or proceed toward Gainesville—if you make this distinction, then all he had to do was to move on toward Gainesville and he would have struck the enemy. If you say the first order should have been followed, then he did not go far enough to the right to join himself with our forces, and so did not obey the order.

Mr. WHEELER. But the only order he ever received directed him to march toward Gainesville. If he had moved to the right, he would have been disobeying that order, and would have placed himself where Longstreet could have advanced on that road and flanked Pope. In that case Porter would have been arrested most certainly, as he ought to have been.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. It makes little difference to me, sir—it should have made little difference to General Porter—whether he construed the order as a command to him to move on toward Gainesville until he struck the enemy or to go far enough to the right to connect with the other Union forces. He did neither, and the only excuse that the gentleman now offers in his behalf is that in his front stood the enemy, twenty-five thousand strong, and for that reason he is to be excused for not fighting.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me make one single statement. When Porter reached Dawkin's Branch he met McDowell. McDowell swears he took command, and said: "I will take my troops (eighteen thousand men) and make a connection, and you remain here."

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That is an entire misapprehension of the situation. General McDowell turned back and left the road upon which the troops of General Porter were distributed, took a road to the right hand, and that evening engaged with the enemy on Porter's right, and General Porter was left to exercise his own volition—to fight or not to fight, as he saw fit, and he saw fit not to fight.

But to return. The gentleman's whole argument this morning was based on the assumption that twenty-five thousand were known by Porter to be in his front. Whether he knew that or not makes little difference; but I say there is no evidence of it. He had learned that Longstreet's advanced pickets were only at Gainesville, 4 miles away, when he himself had position at Dawkin's Branch.

Mr. WHEELER. He had the statement that seventeen regiments had passed through Gainesville at 9.45 that morning.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I beg your pardon. General Porter had no such information at that time. It was obtained afterward, as he himself said. Among all those who have argued this case no one but the gentleman claims that Porter had knowledge there were seventeen regiments in his front at that time.

But no matter. If he had such knowledge, the duty was actually upon him to make an attack upon that twenty-five thousand men; to do what he could to defeat them, or to hold them to their position and prevent Longstreet from sending brigade after brigade to Jackson to assist him in his resistance of the assault which was being made on Jackson's line.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PETERS. I will now yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, through the kindness of my friend from Kansas I am unexpectedly permitted to say a few words in justification of the vote I expect to cast on the pending bill. I do not intend to comment upon the evidence before the court-martial which convicted Fitz-John Porter, nor upon the evidence claimed to have been subsequently discovered and presented to the commission which sought to vindicate him. Only those who have carefully and intelligently studied the whole record are competent to review it and present it before Congress.

But there are certain present surroundings of this case in this presence which can be understood and commented upon without a knowledge of the minute evidence presented to the court-martial. Fitz-John Porter was a soldier by profession; of his own free choice he had selected the tribunal which tried him. In becoming a soldier, adopting that profession for his life-work, he had deliberately chosen the tribunal which should try him for any military offense, the court-martial provided by the statute, and ordered by competent authority. The same tribunal which tries the soldier in the ranks, the subordinate or the higher officer, was the tribunal which he chose before which he went, and by which he was, more than twenty years ago, convicted of grave crimes, and by reason of that conviction ceased to be an officer in the Army of the United States.

This proceeding is an appeal from the court of his own choice to the political judgment of this legislative body. Ostensibly, the purpose of this appeal is to restore Fitz-John Porter to the rolls of the Army and to the salary and emoluments attached to that position when he shall be placed on the retired-list. It is declared, however, that the real purpose of this movement is to vindicate a long-suffering soldier, to take away from him the stigma of having failed in the hour of the nation's need, to lift off his shoulders the burden he has so unjustly borne for so many years.

I desire to say to gentlemen on both sides of this House that this is not the tribunal to relieve Fitz-John Porter from the stigma and stain of the verdict which sent him disgraced out of the Army. The great body of Union soldiers from the Atlantic to the Pacific have long since made up their verdict against Fitz-John Porter, and no action of Congress can recall or change that verdict. Every Congress that sees this matter discussed in this House but strengthens the conviction of that army to which he ought to look for vindication and a reversal of their judgment against him. Instead of standing better before the American people by this proceeding, no day passes in Congress, with this matter discussed and the discussion going out to the great body of men who represented that army of which he was an officer, without a firmer, a stronger, and a deeper feeling in favor of the verdict of the court-martial which convicted him. If it is for vindication, if it is for the purpose of rewriting the history of the country, silence would better become him and his friends.

Congress can not vindicate him. The bill for his relief comes before the House, and it is decided by a divided vote, because men on both sides differ, and you call this a vindication, a vindication by a political body dividing largely on political lines.

It is such a vindication as no professional soldier ought to ask, and therefore such as no Congress ought to attempt to make.

There are some peculiar surroundings, Mr. Chairman, of this case. We are recalling a matter of discipline in the Union Army, a matter in which the great body of the American people adhering to the Union cause were at one time deeply and vitally interested. The men who fought under the same colors as did Fitz-John Porter were the men most deeply interested in the success of their cause and in the discipline of their Army.

To-day the tribunal to which Fitz-John Porter appeals is a tribunal composed not only of men who served in the Union Army and the representatives of those who sustained them at home, but it is a tribunal composed largely of men who were engaged in disciplining another army, men who did not adhere to the Union cause, and the representatives of men not then represented in the Union; and he and his friends expect that such a tribunal, and a bill carried by the votes of the men who were not interested in good discipline in the Union Army, is going to vindicate him before the great body of the American people. Better go down to history without any attempt to rewrite the history of this matter to fit a single case, the case of a man whose interests are no higher than the interests of the private soldier in the ranks; better let future generations rewrite and reread the history of this time when free from personal feelings, when free from passion, when free from political bias Porter may hope to have a fair and candid judgment. It is only by such a judgment that he can hope to have his name and fame relieved from the stigma which now rests upon them.

Mr. Chairman, in this attempt to rewrite history and correct its judgments there is more of politics than men are willing to admit. In 1862, 1863, and 1864, there was a divided political conviction in the North in regard to the way and manner of prosecuting and conducting the war; the Government, the party in power attempting to prosecute it in a certain way, the party out of power were demanding the prosecution in another way, and Fitz-John Porter represented that other way. For twenty years that other way has been in disgrace among the American people, a confessed fault if not a crime; and this action to my mind is but an attempt, at this late day, to change the verdict of the people, and to declare by this vote that he and his confederates represented the true spirit and the true judgment as to how the war should be prosecuted. It is an attempt to justify the action of those whom we were in the habit of characterizing in the North as hostile to the success of the Union arms. It is a revival by Porter and his friends of the old contest between the friends and advocates of a vigorous prosecution of the war and the advocates of compromise—an affirmative vote on this bill is to be the vindication of the compromisers as well as of Fitz-John Porter.

I heard the question asked here to-night: "Were you ever in the presence of an army and did not know it?" I have been in the immediate presence of forty thousand men for nearly the whole day, and did not know it, and not only I, but so gallant and able a soldier as General Sherman did not know it.

All day on the 5th of April, 1862, the Union Army lay in the immediate presence of the confederate army without knowledge that an enemy was near except a small reconnoitering force.

Mr. BRAGG. May I interupt the gentleman?

Mr. ROWELL. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. Let me ask if General Sherman has not certified in a book which he published, and General Grant indorsed the same, and General Prentiss approved the same, that the army at Shiloh was not surprised?

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, there is very great difference between being in the presence of an army and being surprised, between not being surprised and not expecting an engagement. There is a very marked difference between being surprised and knowing that an enemy is very near. General Grant, by a dispatch on the night of the 5th day of April, stated that a reconnoitering force of the enemy had attacked two of his regiments, but he had no idea that a general engagement was to be brought on. But he added that he was prepared. If prepared, it was not a surprise to him. I happened to be there. Whether they were surprised or not I do not know; but I do know, by written statements made at the time, that they did not expect a general engagement; and I do know, by the line of battle, arranged not with reference to fighting, but with reference to health, that they did not expect a battle on that day.

Mr. Chairman, when General Pope came from the West he came from an army whose great battles were always victories, whose every campaign resulted in penetrating deeper into the enemy's country. He came to an equally gallant army, but whose commanding officers had never seemed to know how to fight a battle out. He came, as I believe, to predetermined defeat, as every other man who came from that victorious Western army would have come at that time coming to the Potomac; and yet we in a political body, largely divided by political affiliations, are asked to vindicate a man aiding and intending to aid in the defeat—are asked by our vote to add something to or take something from his record. Why from the close of the war down to the present day there has not been a year in my judgment that some friend or attorney of Fitz-John Porter has not presented to the American people some new argument in favor of his acquittal.

Maps have been reconstructed, history rewritten, social and political influence brought to bear, while year by year the American people have been educated upon this question. In the Forty-eighth Congress day after day this matter was discussed and rediscussed. In this Congress a week of valuable time before a body that has no power to vindicate a man is consumed; and we are going to divide and vote, part on one side and part on the other, and because of political majorities made up of a reunion of all the forces on both sides of the conflict we are going to say by that majority that Fitz-John Porter is vindicated and justified!

It is not wise to forget whence comes the vote which is to vindicate Porter and restore him to the rolls of the Army, for the fiat has gone forth that he is to be so restored, for in remembering these things we shall know how to value the vindication.

Out upon any such vindication, upon any such justification. This is not the tribunal of American judgment; this is not the tribunal which has it in its power to change any single letter of the record, that has it in its power to take away from the purest and best of the American people, its Army that wore the blue, the conviction that Fitz-John Porter deliberately, knowingly, and willfully sacrificed General Pope when he might have saved a battle and won victory for the Union arms.

I am satisfied with the verdict of the court-martial and with the verdict of the great body of the Union Army, and shall express that satisfaction by the vote which I intend to cast upon the pending bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PETERS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. Not being a member of the Committee on Military Affairs I had not expected to engage in this discussion, and until this evening I had no thought or purpose of adding to what I said in the Forty-eighth Congress concerning this case. But at that time I gave to the bill then presented to us for our consideration some thought, some investigation, some careful consideration, and I desire briefly to-night to emphasize and only emphasize what I had then occasion to say.

For more than twenty years it has stood recorded that in an hour of the country's extremity and peril Fitz-John Porter was guilty of insubordination and disobedience of orders; and during all these years the loyal, patriotic heart of this country has indorsed and approved that record. It so approves it now, and asks that in the years that are yet to come it may stand as the recorded judgment of the American people.

Why ought it to be stricken down? What evidence is tendered to us for our consideration? What evidence has been adduced that is calculated to convince any man that the verdict then recorded by that distinguished court-martial was erroneous and wrong? True, it has been criticised; true, supplications and petitions have been presented; true, a military commission reviewed the evidence subsequently, years after that trial and that investigation; a commission that had no power to execute its decrees; a commission that had no power to administer a legal oath; a commission that had no power to command the presence of a witness; a commission constituted and composed of three officers to review the proceedings of a court-martial legally constituted and authorized under the laws of the land sitting for forty-five days patiently, impartially, and conscientiously endeavoring to ascertain and determine the facts.

I have heard it said upon this floor that that is not such a court as is recognized by or known to our Constitution. And yet members here know that quite recently the Supreme Court of the nation in reviewing the celebrated case of Paymaster Smith has recognized and affirmed the constitutionality and legality of military courts-martial, and it has declared the law to be that these officers may not only be tried and court-martialed for offenses committed by them in their military capacity, but they may be court-martialed and tried for offenses committed in a civil capacity if as a matter of fact they are officers representing the Government of the United States.

We all know how important it is, if we desire to ascertain the truth, that a matter shall be investigated when it is fresh in the minds and recollections of the people. As lawyers we all know how important it is, if we are defending criminals, to indulge in delay and procrastination. We know that delay is the essence of our defense, and if we can secure continuances until witnesses are dead; if we can secure delays until facts are forgotten; if we can secure continuances until public interest has subsided or has lost knowledge of the case, then we hope to secure acquittals for our clients. And it has occurred to me that is the essence of this supplication and of this petition that is presented to the American Congress in the name of Fitz-John Porter. When that distinguished court-martial sat for forty-five days and heard the witnesses tendered in defense of Fitz-John Porter, as well as those brought by the Government to confront him with his deeds, all knew the circumstances; the facts were fresh.

General Porter knew whether it rained on that night or not. General Porter knew whether the roads were passable on that night or not. General Porter knew whether his troops were in condition to be marched that night or not. General Porter knew whether he received these orders or not. General Porter knew whether he had moved with expedition and promptness or not. General Porter knew, and so did the country, where the position of these confederate forces was on that day. And now, after more than twenty years from the happening of those events, he comes to Congress to say that that court-martial so patiently investigating these facts knew nothing of them, and were in error.

Is not that, Mr. Chairman, a remarkable proposition? I remember that in the Forty-eighth Congress a distinguished gentleman from New York who had charge of this bill said that we, as members of Congress, were not competent to consider the facts; that we, as members, could not investigate the testimony and determine whether Fitz-John Porter was innocent or guilty. And yet, with that remarkable declaration made here to this House, he pressed upon our attention and our consideration a bill something like the one we are considering to-night. I think it isa remarkable thing in the history of legislative bodies that a man should come before Congress pressing for its consideration such a bill, and yet declaring when so tendering it that that body was not competent to give it an intelligent investigation.

Appeals are made on this floor to us in the name of General Grant; and it is said that after he had given to this subject laborious, careful, and thoughtful investigation he changed his conclusions.

I am glad, Mr. Chairman, to express my appreciation of one fact in connection with this discussion, and that is that it has converted almost all of the Representatives upon the other side of this Chamber into friends of General Grant; and let me say that that better becomes them than the defamation and slander which for years were uttered and expressed against the head and heart of that distinguished statesman and patriotic soldier. But let me suggest to them also that for eight years General Grant had resting upon his shoulders an official oath and official responsibility; for eight years he was the Chief Executive of this nation. During those eight years General Fitz-John Porter knocked at the doors of the Presidential mansion asking that this case of his should be reviewed and reconsidered, and during all that period when General Grant, as President of the United States, had resting upon him the same obligations that rest upon us here to observe and maintain the Constitution and respect the laws, he turned a deaf ear to those solicitations and said: "My duty is plain; my duty is to stand by that court-martial which considered all the evidence and all the facts in an impartial manner and declared that you were guilty as charged in the indictment." Afterward when official responsibility ceased and official cares were laid aside, when General Grant had gone into a different atmosphere and had resting upon him only the simple responsibility of a private citizen, he allowed the avenues to his heart to be opened, and he listened to the supplications and importunities of this unfortunate man. And because General Grant did that we are charged almost with sacrilege because we do not set aside the oath of official responsibility that is imposed upon us as representatives of the American people, and say that we will vindicate, or attempt to vindicate, this man.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHEELER. Did not General Grant say that the reason he did not act in the case while he was General of the Army was that he had been deceived regarding the facts by papers and maps laid before him by General Pope?

Mr. PERKINS. I will answer that by asking another question—whether General Grant did not say, when he was President, that he had given to all the papers in this case most careful consideration, and that he saw no occasion for a review of the proceedings of the judgment of the court? That was the declaration of General Grant as President of this nation. That was the declaration of the Chief Executive, who had the power and the responsibility resting upon him under the law. That, sir, should be the declaration of this American Congress. Let us as citizens listen to these importunities if we will, but as a legislative body let us not tear down the safeguards that have been established for the administration of military justice, and attempt, as has been suggested here, to rewrite history, and in fact to cover with calumny those who sat upon that important military tribunal.

Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes allowed me here I shall not attempt to review the evidence in this case. In the time at my command I should be unable to particularize as I would like to do. But I remember that in the last Congress I heard it stated on the floor of this Chamber that General Fitz-John Porter would not have been a good soldier if he had not burned with contempt of General Pope. That, sir, was a most extraordinary statement. What had General Pope done? Had he wronged Fitz-John Porter? Had he been disloyal to his country? Had he been unfaithful in its hour of peril and extremity? Had he exhibited cowardice or insubordination upon the field of battle? Who was General Pope? He was an officer distinguished for his services in the Army of the United States, a man educated and graduated at the expense of the Government, one who had rendered good service to his country in the Mexican war, one who had already rendered great service in the war of the rebellion. He had come from the West, where victories had been wrenched from the enemy by impetuosity and daring, and when he assumed command of the armies in Virginia the prayers of the loyal people of all this nation sustained him. At that time from every patriotic hearth-stone in the land pleadings went up to the God of battles that victory might perch upon the banners of the Union armies in Virginia, and it was hoped that General Pope, by his energy and genius, might reunite into one great and irresistible whole those broken battalions and organizations. Such was General Pope, and such was the task imposed upon him; and yet it was stated upon the floor of this Chamber that if Fitz-John Porter had not burned with contempt for General Pope he would not have been a good soldier!

Ah, Mr. Chairman, that shows the animus which moved Fitz-John Porter at that time. That in my judgment is the secret of the delay, the insubordination, the disobedience for which he was tried and convicted in those long days in 1862. It has been said by way of excuse that the night was wet; yet it is known to all who have participated in this discussion that on that night soldiers slept in the field without cover and without shelter. It has been said that General Porter's troops were weary and exhausted and that they marched as far as possible under the circumstances; and yet it is known that they moved on that occasion only from 6 to 9 miles, while the enemy, the men who were fighting to overthrow the Government, marched in the same time some 30 miles. It is said that the roads were blockaded so that his march would have been impeded; yet it has been testified by his own officers that, if ordered to do so, they could have removed all the impedimenta in an hour and a half. It has been said that he could not move; yet it has been shown by his officers that had they been so commanded they could have put their troops into position and respected the orders of their superior officers.

Mr. BRAGG. What officer ever testified to that?

Mr. PERKINS. I have not reviewed the testimony for two years, and I will not attempt now to give the officer's name——

Mr. BRAGG. There is no such officer.

Mr. PERKINS. But I will satisfy the gentleman to-morrow, if he so desires, that there was such testimony given before the court-martial by one of Porter's subordinate officers.

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir; you are mistaken.

Mr. PERKINS. I am reviewing this testimony as I remember it from an investigation that I gave to it two years ago.

Mr. BRAGG. You may have read General Logan's speech.

Mr. PERKINS. I did not expect to engage in this discussion until a few moments ago, and therefore I am not prepared to enter into references to the evidence.

These facts confront us; and should they be ignored, should they be set aside, that the importunities, the supplications of this unfortunate man may be heeded by us? I have the honor to represent in part on this floor a State which made more sacrifices for the Union in proportion to its population than any other State. I have the honor to represent in part a State that has to-day more ex-soldiers of the Union in proportion to population than any other State of this nation. And the judgment of that people—not actuated by personal considerations, not actuated by feelings of animosity, not actuated, I hope, by feelings of improper prejudice—the judgment of that people is that instead of having cause for complaint, instead of having cause to condemn the action of the court-martial which tried him, Fitz-John Porter has cause for congratulation to-day that he is suffered to live and enjoy the privileges of an American citizen.

Mr. PETERS. I yield ten minutes to my colleague [Mr. HANBACK].

Mr. HANBACK. Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party never did and never will build a school-house. Upon the wheel of progress it has been a constant air-brake with "Pan-Electric" attachment. [Laughter.] Professing to be the friend of the poor and the humble, it has never wiped from off the brow of labor one drop of sweat. There is in this House at this very moment a bill presented by the leader of this party which, if it shall become a law, will send men away from their shops broken in hope; will send women with their little children into the streets, to land finally in the poor-house and thence in the grave. In this land, in all lands, it has always shouted, "Give us Barabbas!" It is not strange to-night that it should be in favor of the failure whose name is now being pressed upon the House and upon the American people in connection with this bill, because the worst portion of this party that remained in the North constantly voted that the effort to preserve the Union was a continuous failure.

The better part of the Democratic party, believing twenty-five years ago to be oppressed, went out and attempted to destroy this country—the land of our fathers. But the other part remained at home, and as an organization (it is as an organization I speak of it, not of individual members)—as an organization it protested by all the power of its might in its conventions, by the voice of its leaders, against the effort to unite this distracted country.

To it drafts were odious. No matter if the house of the fathers was burning, it sought to hinder men from carrying buckets of water to put out the fire. It shouted through its press that war was murder, and denounced the great and successful commanders as butchers.

It is not strange, therefore, that a solid array of votes from that party will be given on Thursday next in favor of one of the most pronounced failures of the war—not only a failure, but a man who knew better and who failed of his duty.

Five weeks ago, with seven other gentlemen, I took the cars here and went to Manassas Junction for the first time. Carriages awaited us, and we rode out upon the Gainesville road to Bethlehem church, now destroyed save the few bricks that mark its place. I saw where this man, whose restoration to the Army is now advocated, lay all the livelong day on the 29th of August—lay in the hearing of a terrific battle—lay in the hearing of the roar of musketry and the thunder of artillery—lay almost in hearing of the cheers and shouts of the enemies of his country as they swept forward like a besom of destruction over the sons of America fighting for their country—lay under a "fly," not content with the shade—lay quiet there all day, with the head of his column at Dawkin's Branch, with his skirmishers a mile beyond.

During all that day he rested, for there is nothing to show that he rode to his skirmish line, so far in advance of the head of his column. How did he know that an enemy lay before him? Did he advance his line? Did he fire a shot from all his artillery? Did he order an advance to feel the force in his front? No, he rested. I am against a man who rests in battle, save and except it be the company cook, whose right to go to the rear in the hour of battle was never questioned, but whose valor was commended as he crept with painful effort to the skirmish line with a great vessel of hot coffee.

A beautiful country it was in which to fight a battle—hills, dales, and groves of woods. We drove by where the skirmishers were to where, a mile beyond, at Leechman's house, Longstreet planted his first batteries. We drove from there to Groveton, and looked over that field of former strife where so many died on the 29th. We drove farther on, over to the railroad cut and the railroad embankment where Stonewall Jackson held the day not only on the 29th but on the 30th, and where thousands and thousands of men were sacrificed because Porter was resting in sound of the guns, their loved ones weeping to-night in all quarters of the Union with homes darkened by a despair unspeakable, Rachels mourning and refusing to be comforted, and all in that this man failed of his duty. Against the vote which a majority of this House will give I enter my solemn protest in the name of the widows and orphans of the war. I protest in the name of the maimed; in the name of all who suffered in the years succeeding Fitz-John Porter's treasonable delay, I protest. And in the name of the soldiers of the Union who still live, I protest against his rehabiliment in loyal clothing.

I have no time to enter into this discussion. I am sick of the discussion. Talk about men marching in night and rain! I have marched at night when I could not see my horse's ears, and so has the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], because it happens that once upon a time, in the darkest kind of a night, he captured a train in which were my valise and my other baggage and the letters from my girl; and I presume he read them. [Laughter].

Mr. Chairman, let me read Fitz-John Porter against Fitz-John Porter. I have here, in the Century of last June, an article on the battle of Gaines's Mill, in which he writes:

The Prince de Joinville and his two nephews, the Comte de Paris and the Duc de Chartres, were on the field as volunteer aids-de-camp, actively engaged in encouraging the men, carrying messages, and performing other duties of aids. Each of these officers was in the midst of flying musket-balls and was liable to be struck at any moment. At one time the Comte de Paris, regardless of himself, begged me to send his uncle to General McClellan with a message, which would at once and permanently remove him from the dangers of the battle—

My God! what a commentary that was on McClellan! If his uncle could get there but once he would be permanently removed from all danger. And this from Fitz-John Porter—since the family interests at stake were too important to permit him to be so exposed. I had shortly before asked Colonel Gantt, another of McClellan's aids, to hasten to that general and hurry up re-enforcements, as our lines would soon be broken. The danger was now imminent, and I asked the prince to carry the same message, telling him that he was selected because of the speed of his horse. He turned as if to go and I went to attend to the field.

Soon the comte returned, with tears in his eyes and with choking utterance expressive of his care and affection, begged me again to send away his uncle. This also I did. Scarcely had the prince left the second time when our cavalry fell back on us as I have related; our line was broken, and our artillery rendered unserviceable. The prince and Colonel Gantt afterward told me that they did not leave, as I had directed, because all seemed favorable to us, and they thought I could not be in earnest or that I had greatly misjudged the situation.

Here is the gist of the thing:

This shows how sudden the tide may turn in battle, and on what little incidents success may depend.

Why did Fitz-John Porter not think of that when he got all the commands he did from Pope? Should they not have been instantly obeyed; or, at least, should not a prompt desire have been shown? But really he needed no command when he heard the guns. There could have been no stronger call to duty. Here is my friend THOMPSON, a noble man, an honored Representative from Ohio, who was shot on the 29th of August. He is an honorable member of this House; and he was there fighting for his country, while this man, who now seeks to be a colonel in the army he betrayed, was resting.

Fitz-John Porter did not hear that battle! If Phil. Kearny, who died at Chantilly, had commanded that column of ten thousand men would he have put up a "fly" and covered himself up? Would he have gone under the shadow of a tree? Would he have said that he would not go in where McDowell commanded him to go because he would get into trouble? No, sir; he would have marched, as he always did, to the sound of the guns. When he heard the roar of the guns he would have rushed to the assistance of his comrades. He would have marched, as he always did, to the sound of the guns. [Applause.]

Against this man is a charge which history has planted deep-rooted and rock-ribbed, and which this and no other Congress can wipe out. It is a damned spot, which can not be wiped out. It will live there forever. History will not vindicate him. Men will rise up in judgment against him in the future as they did against another man in the past who betrayed his country in her direst hour of distress.

I heard a statement made to-day on this floor of a man whom we all know, that he regarded he had been imposed upon by his judge-advocate. Who was that man? He was a man whose life was worth living beyond all doubt or question. Born in poverty's deep distress, raised in a humble home, uneducated, compelled to follow and in sore distress the devious ways of poverty, led by a strange yet loving circumstance to an interior town in a new State, beloved by all and honored by the people of his town and State for twenty-five years, and suddenly called to fill the highest place in all the land—how shall I speak of him to-night, who was so noble, brave, and true; of him whose pulsing heart beat with love of human kind—the world's oppressed and poor; of him who in the midst of war's wild delirium heard the command as Moses did from Sinai's awful height, heard and obeyed; and breaking in sunder the chains which bound four million souls, bade the oppressed go free; and then in victory's supremest hour, when all his labor had been molded into complete success, slain by the hand of an assassin, the last dastard attempt at the destruction of the country. Dead! No, not dead; for over all the world wherever liberty is loved, wherever freedom's holy spell exerts her peaceful sway, wherever men are suffering under the oppressor's rod, hope grows more buoyant and faith smiles triumphant at Lincoln's name. And because he said the judgment of the court composed of America's noblest sons was right, I shall vote against the man who faltered in the hour of his country's need. [Applause.]

Mr. PETERS. I will yield now for ten minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT].

Mr. BRAGG. I would like to know whether the gentleman has any more time to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour during this evening has been somewhat lengthened.

Mr. BRAGG. That will scarcely do, for the reason this debate may be managed so that time reserved may be carried into to-morrow's debate. I have no objection to a member dealing out all the time which fairly belongs to him, but when he begins to yield time which he does not have I have considerable objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will try to equalize between the two sides before the close of the debate.

Mr. BRAGG. I desired, before the gentleman from Vermont proceeded, to call attention for the benefit of my eloquent and poetical friend from Kansas——

Mr. PETERS. This does not come out of my time.

Mr. BRAGG. Your time has already expired so far as that is concerned.

Mr. PETERS. I have only yielded forty minutes.

Mr. BRAGG. The gentleman has occupied his hour.

Mr. PETERS. I am not the time-keeper.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will protect gentlemen in their rights.

Mr. BRAGG. I want the attention of my poetical and very eloquent friend from Kansas, if he is within hearing of me, because I would like to have him pick up a little information upon this question from some official records which I desire him to hear.

Mr. HANBACK. Very well.

Mr. BRAGG. I read to the gentleman now from the records:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA (NEAR BULL RUN),
August 28, 1862—9.50 p. m.

Major-General KEARNY—

who always went "whenever he heard the musketry firing"——

Mr. HANBACK. Do you say that he did not?

Mr. BRAGG. This is the gentleman who always marched to the sound of the guns.

General McDowell has intercepted the retreat of the enemy—

Mr. HANBACK. I ask the gentleman if he says General Kearny did not march to the sound of firing?

Mr. BRAGG. I do say so.

Mr. HANBACK. Well, that is enough.

Mr. BRAGG. I am going to read the gentleman some dispatches in proof of the fact that he did not.

Mr. HANBACK. I say he did.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask the gentleman's attention:

General McDowell has intercepted the retreat of the enemy, and is now in front; Sigel on the right of McDowell. Unless he can escape by passes leading to the north to-night he must be captured. I desire you to move forward at 1 o'clock to-night even if you carry with you not more than two thousand men, though I trust you will carry the larger part of your division. Pursue the turnpike from Centreville to Warrenton. The enemy is not more than 3½ miles from you. Seize any of the people of the town to guide you. Advance cautiously and drive in the enemy's pickets to-night, and at early dawn attack him vigorously. Hooker shall be close behind you. Extend your right well in the attack. Be sure to march not later than 1, with all the men you can take.

JNO. POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

The testimony of General Heintzelman, if the gentleman will take the trouble to examine it, will show him that General Philip Kearny remained in his camp until after daylight.

Mr. HANBACK. I think General Kearny was dead at that time, was he not?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. HANBACK. I mean at the time that the testimony was given.

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. HANBACK. And could not be present to contradict?

Mr. BRAGG. Now, if the eloquent gentleman from Kansas will give me his attention a little further I will read a part of the report upon the battle.

Mr. HANBACK. Not General Kearny's.

Mr. BRAGG. He could not make one after he was dead. Perhaps where you are all going you will be able to hear his report. [Laughter].

General Pope arrived between 1 and 2 p. m. The enemy—

And I refer now to the operations of Grover's brigade, which the member from New Hampshire, a member of that brigade, testified had failed of its support. I read the official comments of the action—

The enemy were driven back a short distance toward Sudley church, where they made another stand, and again pressed a portion of our line back. All this time General Kearny's division held its position on our extreme right. Several orders were sent to him to advance, but he did not move until after the troops on his left had been forced back, which was near 6 o'clock p. m.

There was the support for Grover; that gallant brigade which was almost annihilated. If you look further to the official records you will find that at the same time Porter received the dispatch to move at 1 o'clock, 9 miles from Pope's headquarters, General Philip Kearny was resting 4 miles from Pope's headquarters, just upon his right; and though he received this dispatch, "Move at the first blush of dawn," General Kearny arrived at Bristoe after the 4-mile march an hour after Porter arrived after the 9-mile march. [Applause.]

Mr HANBACK. Well, that is all right. He was a fighter all the same, wasn't he?

Mr. BRAGG. Oh, no doubt of that. I do not say anything against that.

Mr. HANBACK. And he wasn't court-martialed either, was he?

Mr. BRAGG. He was not.

Mr. PETERS. I was but a boy at the time of the battle of Bull Run, a beardless youth with three stripes on my arm, a mere file-closer in a company. I did not know much about war at that time, although I had been in the army from October, 1861, the beginning of the campaign in Virginia. I did not know anything about generals. I did not know anything about positions. I remember with what admiration and almost reverence I looked upon the first major-general that I ever saw knowing him to be such, and he was not a very large major-general either. I will not mention his name. But I remember when I saw those two stars on his shoulder that I thought he was something of a god.

I do not place my vote or my position upon this bill upon my own information or upon my own judgment, for the reason that at that time

I knew nothing of war and was young and inexperienced. But I hold in my hand a history written by the colonel of my regiment, a faithful diary kept by him of almost each day's events, and I rest my case and my vote upon the record therein contained. I know that a man who then commanded Company A of my regiment, and who afterward commanded my regiment and carried it from the time he won his promotion up to the very close of the war, a man whom I know personally, a man who did have judgment, a man who was the acquaintance, the friend, the intimate friend of those who did command corps and divisions at Bull Run—I know that so far as my vote is concerned I can base it upon his statement, and that I may rely upon that statement as being that of a mature man, a mature and military mind. His history was not written in the interest of Fitz-John Porter; it was not written in the interest of Major-General Pope; because in this little narrative he criticises General Pope perhaps with more severity than he does any other man that had connection with that battle.

I have a great deal of charity for men who have made mistakes But upon this one question and this one bill I realize that I have more feeling and perhaps, I will frankly say, I have more prejudice than upon any other question that can come before this House; because upon that Bull Run battlefield one of the best and truest of my boyhood friends that went with me from college to the battlefield laid down his life; and as I believed then and as my regiment believed then, as I believe now and as my regiment believes now, he might, in all probability, have been living to-day if Fitz-John Porter had been where he was ordered to be on the morning of the 29th.

I say I have not the calmness and deliberation to argue or reason upon this proposition. I have too much feeling upon it. I have too much intense friendship for that boy-lieutenant who died upon that field of battle, as well as for the one hundred and seventy others of my regiment who were killed and wounded, it being the regiment that was upon the left of our army upon the day of the 30th. I wish I had time to read a little of what was written by my colonel, written down at the time, in regard to the movements that were made. Suffice it to say that he shows by that little record that he kept that on the 29th day of August, Schenck's division was ordered to move to the right of the pike on which my regiment was; that Colonel McLean's brigade, the Ohio brigade composed of the Seventy-third (which was my regiment), the Seventy-fifth, the Fifty-fifth, and the Twenty-fifth Ohio—that Schenck, with his division, of which this brigade was a part, was commanded to move to the right; that General McDowell and General Porter were coming in upon our left. General McDowell came in upon our left, and his gallant boys went forward just before dark and made a grand charge. But Porter's corps came not.

They say there was no fighting upon the 29th. Why, sir, can any man convince me that there was no fight upon the 29th? Can any man make me believe that my right hand is not raised? Can any man make me believe that I am not living? I say I can not argue upon this proposition, and I feel that intensity of emotion upon this subject that I can not suppress. When men say to me there was no battle on the 29th, I know they say what they do not know to be true; and I know they say what the men of my regiment know to be false.

I have, as I said, charity for a man who has done wrong. I have a great deal of charity for Fitz-John Porter, because of the school in which he was raised, not only from the time he entered West Point, but from the time of the beginning of the war of the rebellion up to the battle of Bull Run. I believe, and I say it with reverence, that Abraham Lincoln was responsible to some extent for the disobedience of orders that Fitz-John Porter was guilty of on that day.

Fitz-John Porter was an intimate friend and pet of General George B. McClellan, and the great-hearted Lincoln, in his desire to save the country, was so liberal and indulgent in his conduct toward that general, that Fitz-John Porter had been led to believe that General McClellan controlled this country, and that no man could do otherwise than as General McClellan desired. I believe that Fitz-John Porter believed firmly that whatever his conduct might be General George B. McClellan could shield him from the consequences of his own acts.

Who can read the history of that time written by a member of this House, showing the relations that existed between General McClellan and the President of the United States during that period, and fail to recognize the fact that Abraham Lincoln was entirely too lenient toward General McClellan, and that the very fact of his great leniency undermined the discipline of the Army of the Potomac? Fitz-John Porter, under the training and schooling of his association with McClellan, who day after day violated the orders of the President, failing to move upon the enemy—Fitz-John Porter, I say, realized or thought he realized that he was safe beneath the shadow of the wing of the man who was in command of that Army at that time. Mr. Chairman, I do not say this by way of reflection upon General McClellan, because I believe, with a firmness akin to the belief I have in the guilt of Fitz-John Porter, that McClellan as a general acting upon the defensive was a great general. He was not born nor educated to be an offensive general, but it is no fault of his that he was incapable of working out an offensive campaign. I say that Fitz-John Porter's associations were such that he was led to believe that he could disobey the order of his superior officer and not be guilty of any great offense or crime. So, when he received these orders from General Pope, influenced as he was by the feeling that had existed in the Army of the Potomac under the command of General McClellan, he did not realize that it was his duty as a soldier to obey them regardless of results.

They tell me that Fitz-John Porter had the right at the time to determine whether it was politic or prudent for him to make the attack as ordered. Suppose Major Peter Keenan, with his four hundred cavalrymen at Chancellorsville, when General Pleasanton said to him, "Major, you must take your four hundred men and charge in the face of Jackson and gain me thirty minutes' time in which to load these guns"—suppose Major Peter Keenan on that occasion had answered, "Ah, it is death to go in there, and I will not do it!" Did he say that? Ah, no! That gallant soldier gave the command to his four hundred men, "Forward!" and every one of those men knew as well as he knew that when he went forward in the face of that column he was going to almost certain death. Nevertheless they charged, and gained for Pleasanton the thirty minutes' time he needed; and he loaded his guns to the muzzle, and when Jackson had wiped away the heroic little column and his troops came forward again they were met with a volley of grape that took them off their feet, staggered their column, and I believe saved the Union army for that time. But, I say, suppose Major Peter Keenan had received the order of his commanding general on that occasion as Fitz-John Porter received the order of General Pope and refused to obey as did Fitz-John Porter, he would have been tried for disobedience, and Hooker's army might have been destroyed.

Jackson's column was one that could be met only by men who were prepared to stand up against it with the same persistence and energy and determination that urged it forward. I had the fortune, or the misfortune, to fight against Jackson's column at Chancellorsville and at other places, and, though only a boy at the time, I know whereof I speak when I say that the only way to repulse the charge of that column was to meet it with equal energy and equal determination to do or die. So I say that General Fitz-John Porter, when he received the order from General Pope to make an attack, was in duty bound as a soldier to make the attack, and by making it determine whether it could be successful or not. It was for Pope to consider what the consequences would be. If the consequences were fatal the responsibility would rest upon General Pope and not upon General Porter. I think it is disclosed by the evidence, at least it is to my mind, that Fitz-John Porter did not really know at the time the extent of the force that was in front of him. But suppose he did, he had no right to believe other than that General Pope intended him to make that attack, even though he sacrificed his entire corps, in order that other portions of the army might be relieved and that the plan of the major-general commanding the army might be carried out to a successful termination. Sir, if Fitz-John Porter had been as good a soldier as Maj. Peter Keenan was at Chancellorsville, he would have made that attack when it was ordered with as much firmness and as much intensity and as much zeal, and I believe that if he had made an attack, as he should have done, on the 29th of August, my regiment would not have gone back on the 30th almost wholly cut to pieces, broken up, demoralized, and thrown into such a condition that months of recruiting were required to restore it to even minimum strength.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman please mention the name of his regiment?

Mr. PETERS. The Seventy-third Ohio. Colonel McLean, colonel of one of the Ohio regiments, was the brigade commander, in General Schenck's division.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I said in the beginning of my remarks that I did not base my vote on this question upon my own experience or knowledge. Like every one who as a boy shouldered his musket and went out to fight I have an intuition upon this subject and I have great confidence in that intuition. I have also great confidence in those who were over me at that time, with whom I have conversed since, and whose statements in relation to it, written down at the time, I have read and reread.

But I base my judgment upon this bill, also upon the justice and completeness of the trial by court-martial. I know it is said that Mr. Lincoln had not time to review the finding. But, sir, any one who knows something about that great heart of Lincoln, and about his treatment of men who commanded our armies, must realize that every drop of blood in his veins beat in sympathy with the man who had suffered a misfortune. That man who could against the undivided opinion of his Cabinet place General George B. McClellan in command of the Army and retain him there until after Antietam would have done no injustice to Fitz-John Porter. The sentence of that court as laid before Mr. Lincoln, if I have been correctly informed, was something more than cashiering from the service of the United States; and it was the kind, grand, noble heart of Lincoln that prevented the carrying out of a sentence which, if executed according to the finding of the court, would have placed it out of the power of Fitz-John Porter to appeal to-day to the American Congress to reinstate him. I base my judgment upon those things which I believe were fairly and carefully adjudicated at the time, and upon that judgment I am willing to stand or fall.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote against this bill. And I am moved to give some of my reasons for that vote, because I think it profitable to hold the attention of the House and of the public to the law and the facts which should control in the disposition of it.

On the 10th day of January, A. D., 1863, nine general officers of the United States Army, to wit, David Hunter, E. A. Hitchcock, Rufus King, B. M. Prentiss, James B. Ricketts, Silas Casey, James A. Garfield, N. B. Buford, and James P. Slough, sitting as a general court-martial, found General Fitz-John Porter guilty of certain charges and specifications, alleging the disobedience of certain orders, not necessary here to be recited, but which will be read further on; which orders were issued by General Pope, then commanding the Army of Virginia, just before and on the first day of the second battle of Bull Run. The trial was had under the ninth article of war, which is as follows:

Any officer or soldier who * * * shall disobey any lawful command of his superior officer, shall suffer death, or such other punishment as shall, according to the nature of his offense, be inflicted upon him by the sentence of a court-martial.

The court found a general verdict of guilty, and passed the following sentence:

And the court do therefore sentence him, Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter, of the United States volunteers, to be cashiered, and to be forever disqualified from holding any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States.

D. HUNTER,
Major-General, President.
J. HOLT, Judge-Advocate.

In accordance with the sixty-fifth article of war the proceedings of this court-martial were reviewed by President Lincoln, and the following was the result:

The foregoing proceedings, findings, and sentence in the foregoing case of Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter are approved and confirmed; and it is ordered that the said Fitz-John Porter be, and hereby is, cashiered and dismissed from the service of the United States as a major-general of volunteers, and as colonel and brevet brigadier-general in the regular service of the United States, and forever disqualified from holding any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

JANUARY 21, 1863.

Now, here was a conviction and a sentence by a legally constituted judicial tribunal, which had jurisdiction of both the subject-matter and the person of the accused.

This verdict and sentence were approved by the President of the United States, the only person who under the laws of the land had revisory power over them. It was in every sense a judicial proceeding, and as such Congress has no more authority under the Constitution to inquire into it or set it aside, as proposed by this bill, than it has to set aside a decision of the courts.

Benét, in his excellent work on military law, says:

A court-martial is the proper and sole tribunal for the trial of military officers. It is a lawful tribunal, existing by the same authority that any other court exists, and the law military is a branch of law as valid as any other, and it differs from the general law of the land in authority only in this—that it applies to officers and soldiers of the Army but not to other members of the body-politic, and that it is limited to breaches of military duty.

Caleb Cushing, Attorney-General in 1854, speaking on this subject, says:

The decisions of the President of the United States in cases of this sort are that of the ultimate judge provided by the Constitution and the laws. Like that of any other court in the last resort of the law, it is final as to the subject-matter.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in Reed ex parte, 100 United States Reports, 13, hold the following language:

The constitutionality of the acts of Congress touching Army and Navy courts-martial in this country, if there could ever have been a doubt about it, is no longer an open question in this court. It is the organism provided by law and clothed with the duty of administering justice in this class of cases. Its judgments when approved as required rest on the same base and are surrounded by the same considerations which give conclusiveness to the judgments of other legal tribunals, including as well the lowest as the highest under like circumstances.

And again, in Dynes vs. Hoover, 20 Howard, 81, the court says:

If a sentence be so confirmed it becomes final, and must be executed unless the President pardons the offender. * * * When confirmed it is altogether beyond the jurisdiction or inquiry of any civil tribunal whatever, unless it shall be in a case in which the court had not jurisdiction over the subject-matter or charge, or one in which, having jurisdiction, it has failed to observe the rules prescribed by the statute for its exercise.

But there is no pretense that this court-martial had not jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the accused; nor is there any claim that the proceedings were not regular in every respect, from the order convening the court to the approval by the President. Courts-martial are, of course, the creatures of Congress, but no more so than are all the courts of the United States, except alone the Supreme Court, for which the Constitution in terms provides. In the one case the Constitution says:

Congress shall have power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

And under this clause it created courts-martial. In the other case the Constitution says:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

And under this clause the circuit and district courts, the courts of the District of Columbia and in the Territories, all have their existence by authority of Congress. But this gives Congress no revisory power over the work of courts-martial, nor over the work of any of these other courts, of which it is equally the creator.

Now what would be thought by the lawyers of this House and of the country were a proposition to be brought in here to annul and set aside some judgment of a district or circuit court? There could be but one opinion. It would be denounced as an usurpation of judicial authority by the legislative branch of the Government.

The alarm would at once be sounded and we should be warned of the dangers which all the great writers upon the Constitution have foretold as certain to result from the encroachment by one of the co-ordinate branches of our system upon the prerogatives of the other branches; and if, in the language of the Supreme Court in Reed ex parte, above cited, "its judgments"—the judgments of a court-martial—"when approved as required, rest upon the same base and are surrounded by the same considerations which give conclusiveness to the judgment of other legal tribunals, including as well the lowest as the highest," wherein is the proposition of this bill to annul and set aside the findings and sentence of this court-martial any less an attack upon the sanctity and finality of judicial proceedings than if it were a proposition to overhaul some judgment of one of the Federal courts? Wherein would the one be any less a case of legislative intermeddling than the other?

But some one asks, is there no relief against the mistakes of courts-martial? No opportunity for newly-discovered evidence to save the innocent from the fate which the guilty alone should suffer? Certainly there is; and that relief is ample, and may be invoked at any time before the sentence is executed. That part of the sentence which dismissed General Porter from the service was executed at the time, and upon the authority of the Supreme Court in Dynes vs. Hoover above cited, "is altogether beyond the jurisdiction of any civil tribunal whatever." That part of the sentence which disqualified General Porter from holding office was a continuing sentence, and was, of course, at any time subject to remission by the President, and acting upon the doubts which have arisen in the case, the President has fully relieved General Porter from all disabilities on account of that part of the sentence; and he is to-day eligible to any office within the gift of the people or the President.

Now, if the Democratic party is determined to have Fitz-John Porter vindicated—and I say this because an examination of the record discloses the fact that only one Democrat in both the House and Senate voted against the bill identical with this which was passed by the Forty-eighth Congress, but was finally vetoed by President Arthur—I say if the Democracy want him vindicated let this Democratic administration send his name into the Senate for such office as shall satisfy both himself and his party, and the proposition can then be considered upon its merits. His dismissal from the service will be no legal bar to his confirmation to any office except that from which he was dismissed, and perhaps not from that if a vacancy existed at the time of the appointment and the appointment was of and for that time. But that is not what this bill proposes. This bill recites in the preamble the findings and judgment of the court-martial and the recommendation of the advisory board that that judgment be annulled and set aside, and then in the enacting clause authorizes the President and Senate to appoint General Porter to the identical office from which he was dismissed and as from the date of his dismissal. Now, if the President and Senate were to do this is it not perfectly plain that it would annul and set aside the judgment of the court-martial? It is a maxim of law that that can not be legally done indirectly which can not be done directly.

Remember that General Porter is not pardoned from that part of the sentence dismissing him from the service. Now, while this bill does not propose in terms to "annul and set aside" that part of the sentence by cautiously keeping that proposition out of the enacting clause, reciting it only in the preamble, it does authorize the President and Senate to restore him to his old office as of the very date of his dismissal. If this be done, what has became of the sentence of dismissal? Has it still any force? Clearly not. It has been met face to face by the action of the President and Senate under this bill and is destroyed. It has been "annulled and set aside." The result is the same as though the enacting clause was to that effect. This indirection does not relieve from the Constitutional objection. It is none the less an attack by the legislative branch of the Government upon the validity and finality of a judicial sentence.

Let us not forget that we are living under a government of law, and that that government can be best preserved by an adherence to the forms and requirements and limitations which the law has prescribed. And I repeat, if some holocaust must be made to Fitz-John Porter let it at least be brought within the forms of law. Let his admirers have him nominated to some office, to any office, to which, under the pardon of the President, he is eligible, and take his chances before the Senate. But let Congress halt on the proper limit of its prerogatives. Let it still maintain some respect for that conclusiveness of judicial proceedings which the jurisprudence and the legislation of every civilized people on the face of the globe have always regarded as inviolable.

This constitutional objection would be quite sufficient to determine my vote against this bill, even though I felt that General Porter was wronged by the judgment of the court-martial. But failing, as I do, to find any equity in his case, and seeing, as I do, the dangers attendant upon the invasion of the judicial by the legislative power of our Government, and seeing also the demoralizing effect which the overthrow of these court-martial proceedings must surely have upon the future discipline of the Army, like "him who hath his quarrel just," I feel that those who may vote against this bill are at least "thrice armed;" armed with the highest considerations of a sound public policy; armed with the sanctions of the law and with even-handed justice. And now having done with the law, let us look a little into the facts of the case.

To fully understand the relation of Fitz-John Porter and his command to General Pope and the Army of Virginia at the time of the second battle of Bull Run, it will be necessary to take a glance at the military situation as covered just before and at that time by the operations of both the Army of Virginia and the Army of the Potomac.

It is matter of history how, in the early spring of 1862, the Army of the Potomac, General McClellan, commanding, started for Richmond by way of the Peninsula. It is also matter of history that the long, weary days of June found that patient, heroic army in a deadlock with the enemy in the swamps of the Chickahominy.

During the last days of June that series of battles was fought which resulted in the disastrous retreat of the Army of the Potomac to the cover of the gunboats at Harrison's Landing.

Meantime, for the purpose of relieving the Army of the Potomac of its perilous situation, the Army of Virginia was organized and given to the command of General Pope. This command mustered about thirty-seven thousand men, and General Pope took personal command at Warrenton on the 29th of July, 1862. The problem with the War Department was how to get the Army of the Potomac again into the field as an aggressive force and at the same time prevent the capture of Washington and the invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania. To assume offensive operations again upon the Peninsula, McClellan required reenforcements far beyond the power of the War Department to furnish.

General Halleck, just then appointed General-in-Chief, went to Harrison's Landing and inspected the Army of the Potomac, and on his return to Washington on the 3rd of August issued an order for the withdrawal of that army by transports to the defenses of Washington, and for the re-enforcement of the Army of Virginia. The difficult and perilous duty was assigned to General Pope of standing between Lee's army and the capital until the Army of the Potomac should come up. It was in the nature of a forlorn hope, and General Pope asked to be relieved, but the authorities held him to the undertaking. General McClellan had all the time insisted that no part of Lee's army could or should be detached for a movement on Washington while he held Harrison's Landing. But it is a fact in history that on the very day General McClellan received the order to evacuate Harrison's Landing, August 4, Jackson was at Gordonsville, and five days later, August 9, which was five days before McClellan had embarked a man, he encountered Pope's army at Cedar Mountain, more that 100 miles from Richmond, and with his own, Ewell's, and A. P. Hill's divisions, fought a severe battle, in which the confederate killed and wounded were some fourteen hundred. This was the first of that series of sharp encounters between the confederate forces and the Army of Virginia which culminated on the 29th and 30th of August in the second battle of Bull Run. During these twenty eventful days the headquarters of the gallant little Army of Virginia were where the commander foresaw they would be, literally "in the saddle," and the officers and men were constant in watching, and marching, and fighting.

General Pope's plan was to lie off on the flank of the enemy, for his greatly inferior numbers did not justify meeting him face to face, and by rapid movements and unexpected attacks upon his line of march and his communications delay him as much as possible till the arrival of the transports.

He first maintained, till no longer tenable, the line of the Rapidan; but was compelled on the 18th of August to fall back across the Rappahannock, meanwhile hardly a day passing in which there was not collision somewhere between the two armies.

Now, as showing something of the character of the campaign General Pope was conducting, which in turn must give character to the orders issued during that campaign, and especially those of the 27th and 29th of August to Fitz-John Porter, I will here read a couple of orders from the General-in-Chief:

WASHINGTON, August 18, 1862.

General POPE:

I fully approve your movement. I hope to push a part of Burnside's forces to near Barnet's Ford by to-morrow night to assist you in holding that pass. Stand firm on the line of the Rappahannock till I can help you. Fight hard and aid will come.

H. W. HALLECK, General-in-Chief.

Here is another, three days later:

WASHINGTON, August 21, 1862.

General POPE:

I have just sent Burnside's reply. General Cox's forces will be here to-morrow and next day. Dispute every inch of ground and fight like the devil till we can re-enforce you. Forty-eight hours more and we can make you strong enough. Don't yield an inch if you can help it.

H. W. HALLECK, General-in-Chief.

These and such as these were the orders under which General Pope was acting, and probably none more urgent or positive were issued during the late war on either side. Nor were the orders more urgent than was the situation. It must be admitted that both Pope's army and the capital back of it were in very great peril. August 21 Lee had his headquarters at Culpeper. On the 25th Jackson with his own and Ewell's and A. P. Hill's divisions crossed the Rappahannock well up that stream, where Pope's extended line was too weak for successful resistance, and by a forced march on the 26th reached Bristoe Station at just about nightfall and captured two trains of cars.

General Jackson in his report says they had marched 30 miles that day, but hearing of a supply of stores at Manassas Junction, some miles away, though the night was dark, he dispatched a force to capture that place, which was successfully done.

The 27th, Hill's and Jackson's divisions went to Manassas Junction, 4 miles toward Washington. Ewell's division remained at Bristoe Station, and toward night was attacked and driven back by General Pope's advance under Hooker, coming from the direction of Warrenton Junction. In this encounter our loss was about three hundred.

Now let us leave for a moment these three confederate divisions with their location on the evening of the 27th of August thus distinctly fixed, and bring General Fitz-John Porter upon the scene; for it was on this evening that he recieved from General Pope an important order, which, with others that he afterwards received, the court-martial found he did not obey.

Here a dispatch from General Halleck to General McClellan becomes important:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 19, 1862.

General MCCLELLAN,
Commanding Army Potomac, Fort Monroe:

The enemy is moving in great force across the Rapidan. It is of vital importance that you send forward troops as rapidly as possible, leaving the material which is not absolutely necessary, to follow more leisurely. We want immediately all the men that can possibly be sent.

H. W. HALLECK, General-in-Chief.

Among the orders to the corps commanders by General McClellan hurrying them up was the following exceptional and significant one to Fitz-John Porter:

AUGUST 20, 1862—11 a. m.

General PORTER:

Please push off your troops without one moment's delay. The necessity is very pressing—a case of life and death. What progress is made and when will you be through? See me before you sail.

GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN.

This order is exceptional because no other order issued by him in the embarkation of his troops, which remember he was called upon on the 4th day of August to make, approaches this in urgency of language; it is exceptional also because of the request "see me before you sail."

None of the many dispatches to his other officers contain any similar request. And perhaps only for Fitz-John Porter's subsequent conduct it would be a circumstance too slight to attract attention. But in the light of that conduct it at once becomes significant as showing betweenthese men some matter of private or personal concernment; something not suitable or, at least, not desired by General McClellan to be communicated officially. It may have been only a matter of intense personal friendship which could not give the "good-by and God bless you" without at the same time a fervent grasp of the hand.

If it were this and nothing more, it was still significant as giving color to what General Porter said and did afterward. Whether there was a meeting under this request, and, if so, what passed between them, there is nothing in the case to show. General Porter embarked with his corps at Newport News the 21st and disembarked at Aquia Creek the 22d, going by rail to Falmouth, thence up the Rappahannock under General Burnside's orders to join Pope's army.

On the 26th he received his first order from General Pope, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Warrenton Junction, August 26, 1862—7 o'clock p. m.

GENERAL: Please move forward with Sykes's division to-morrow morning through Fayetteville to a point two and a half miles of the town of Warrenton, and take position where you can easily move to the front, with your right resting on the railroad. Call up Morell to join you as speedily as possible, leaving only small cavalry forces to watch the fords. If there are any troops below, coming up, they should come up rapidly, leaving only a small rear guard at Rappahannock Station. You will find General Banks at Fayetteville. I append below the position of our forces, as also those of the enemy. I do not see how a general engagement can be postponed more than a day or two.

McDowell, with his own corps, Sigel's, and three brigades of Reynolds's men, being about thirty-four thousand, are at and immediately in front of Warrenton; Reno joins him on his right and rear, with eight thousand men, at an early hour to-morrow; Cox, with seven thousand men, will move forward to join him in the afternoon of to-morrow; Banks, with six thousand men, is at Fayetteville; Sturgis, about eight thousand strong, will move forward by day after to-morrow; Franklin, I hope, with his corps, will by day after to-morrow night, occupy the point where the Manassas Gap Railroad intersects the turnpike from Warrenton to Washington City; Heintzelman's corps will be held in reserve here at Warrenton Junction until it is ascertained that the enemy has begun to cross Hedgeman's River. You will understand how necessary it is for our troops to be in position as soon as possible. The enemy's line extends from a point a little east of Warrenton Sulphur Springs around to a point a few miles north of the turnpike from Sperryville to Warrenton, with his front presented to the east, and his trains thrown round well behind him in the direction of Little Washington and Sperryville. Make your men cook three days' rations and keep at least two days' cooked rations constantly on hand. Hurry up Morell as rapidly as possible, as also the troops coming up in his rear. The enemy has a strong column still farther to his left toward Manassas Gap Railroad, in the direction of Salem.

JOHN POPE.
Major-General, Commanding.

Maj. Gen. FITZ-JOHN PORTER,
Commanding Fifth Army Corps.

Here is what Porter sent to General Burnside, to whom it was his duty to communicate all information:

FROM ADVANCE, 11.45 P. M., August 26,
Received August 27, 1862.

Major-General BURNSIDE:

Have just received orders from General Pope to move Sykes to-morrow to within two miles of Warrenton, and to call up Morell to same point, leaving the fords guarded by cavalry. He says the troops in rear should be brought up as rapidly as possible, leaving only a small rear guard at Rappahannock Station, and that he can not see how a general engagement can be put off more than a day or two. I shall move up as ordered, but the want of grain and the necessity of receiving a supply of subsistence will cause some delay. Please hasten back the wagon sent down, and inform McClellan that I may know I am doing right. Banks is at Fayetteville; McDowell, Sigel, and Ricketts at and immediately in front of Warrenton; Reno on his right; Cox joins to-morrow, Sturgis next day, and Franklin is expected. So says General Pope.

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

On reading this dispatch from Porter to Burnside one can not help asking by what enchantment Fitz-John Porter felt himself so fastened to the fortunes of General McClellan or so controlled by his will that he wanted him informed that he was going to obey the order of his superior officer and move up his corps toward the impending battle. This dispatch shows another thing. It shows that General Porter was questioning in his own mind if he would be doing right to obey this first order from General Pope. He was also questioning if he would in fact obey it. But it seems he concluded to do so, for he says, "I shall move up as ordered," suggesting at the same time causes of delay if, perchance, it should be thought by any one that he did not move as rapidly as he might.

Saying nothing more, this dispatch from Porter to Burnside shows at least a strong anxiety not to displease McClellan. It confesses in unmistakable terms that McClellan had reason to expect something different from what he was going to do. It, at least, confesses that Fitz-John Porter understood McClellan was expecting something different.

When and where and how did Porter get that understanding? But he did "move up as ordered;" and on the 27th, at night, was at Warrenton Junction.

Now, with Porter at Warrenton Junction, recall the fact that on that same night we left the confederate divisions of Jackson and Hill at Manassas Junction, and that of Ewell at Bristoe Station, four miles further down the railroad, it being nine miles still further down the track to Warrenton Junction, where Porter was. Recall, also, Hooker's quite severe engagement with Ewell at Bristoe, just about nightfall; and add to this the fact that that engagement had left Hooker about out of ammunition, and you have the situation under which an order was issued by Pope, who was with Hooker's advance, to Porter, which he did not obey. It is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Bristoe Station, August 27, 1862—6.30 p. m.

GENERAL: The major-general commanding directs that you start at 1 o'clock to-night and come forward with your whole corps, or such part of it as is with you, so as to be here by daylight to-morrow morning. Hooker has had a very severe action with the enemy, with a loss of about three hundred killed and wounded. The enemy has been driven back, but is retiring along the railroad. We must drive him from Manassas, and clear the country between that place and Gainesville, where McDowell is. If Morell has not joined you, send word to him to push forward immediately; also send word to Banks to hurry forward with all speed to take your place at Warrenton Junction. It is necessary, on all accounts, that you should be here by daylight. I send an officer with this dispatch who will conduct you to this place. Be sure to send word to Banks, who is on the road from Fayetteville, probably in the direction of Bealeton. Say to Banks, also, that he had best run back the railroad trains to this side of Cedar Run. If he is not with you, write him to that effect.

By command of Major-General Pope:

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Major-General F. J. PORTER,
Warrenton Junction.

P. S.—If Banks is not at Warrenton Junction leave a regiment of infantry and two pieces of artillery as a guard till he comes up, with instructions to follow you immediately. If Banks is not at the junction instruct Colonel Cleary to run the trains back to this side of Cedar Run, and post a regiment and section of artillery with it.

By command of Major-General Pope:

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Porter received this order about 9.30 the same evening. Did he obey it?

The hesitation which was shown over the first order from Pope to him was now changed to resolution, and he deliberately decided to disobey it. Here is the proof:

General Morell says, on page 138 of court-martial record:

Q. Do you know anything of an order received by General Porter from General Pope on the evening of the 27th of August?

A. Yes, sir. I was present when he received one brought by Captain De Kay.

Q. About what hour?

A. About 10 o'clock.

Q. Who else, as you recollect, was present at the time?

A. General Sykes and General Butterfield were either present or came in a very few minutes after. I do not know which.

Q. State what occurred at the time of the receipt of the order, or immediately afterward, between the accused and yourself and the other generals.

A. General Porter said to us that he had received this order to march at 1 o'clock that night. We immediately spoke of the condition of our troops—they being very much fatigued—and the darkness of the night, and said that we did not believe we could make any better progress by attempting to start at that hour than if we waited until daylight. After some little conversation, General Porter said, "Well, we will start at 3 o'clock—get ready." I immediately left his tent and went back to my division and made preparations for moving.

This shows that he decided not to start till 3 o'clock, and instead of reaching Bristoe at daylight he did not get there till after 10 o'clock. Of course for such palpable disobedience some excuse must be formulated. What could it be? It was that the night was dark, that a wagon-train was in the road and his troops needed rest. First, as to the wagon-train. Had the two roads on the two sides of the railroad track—for there was one on either side—been full of wagons his troops could have moved along the track, or he could have ordered them to put the wagons out of the road and gone along had he wanted to. But the fact is, there were no wagons in the road that night between Porter and Bristoe Station at 1 o'clock. Here is the proof of it found on page 106, court-martial proceedings.

Lieut. Col. Frederick Myers was then called by the Government and sworn, and examined as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Q. Will you state to the court in what capacity you served in the Army of Virginia, under Major-General Pope, during its late campaign in July and August last?

A. I was chief quartermaster to General McDowell.

Q. Where were you on the night of the 27th of August last?

A. I was with the trains of the Army, about a mile and a half from where General Hooker had his battle on the 27th.

Q. Did you, or not, receive any instructions from General Pope on that day relating to your train along the road from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station? If so, state what they were.

A. I was ordered to move the trains in rear of General Hooker. Just before dark General Pope with his staff rode up, and I reported to him that General Hooker was in action ahead of me, and asked him if I should go into park with my trains. He replied that I could do so, or go on, as I thought best.

Q. What did you do; did you go into park, or did you continue on?

A. I went into park, and gave directions to all the quartermasters to go into park.

Q. At what hour on the following morning were those trains upon that road put in motion?

A. The head of the train commenced moving just at daylight.

Q. What was the condition of the road between Warrenton Junction and Bristoe Station at that time, so far as regards the passage of wagons, artillery, &c.?

A. It was in excellent condition at that time.

Q. Do you remember the character of that night—the night of the 27th of August? If so, will you please state it?

A. I was up nearly all that night. It was quite dark; there was no moon.

Q. Did the night change in its character toward the morning, or was it the same throughout?

A. It was a dark night. I could not state about it, toward morning particularly.

Q. In view of the condition of the road as you have described it, and also the character of the night, was or was not the movement of troops along that road practicable that night?

A. I do not know of anything to hinder troops moving along the railroad there. There was a road running each side of the railroad. I should think it would have been easy for troops to move along there, although I may be mistaken in that.

In addition to the above from the commander of the wagon-train himself, here is confirmation from Capt. Drake De Kay, Pope's aide-de-camp, who carried the order to Porter, and was to conduct his column to Bristoe. It may be found on page 45 court-martial record:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Q. Did you remain over night, and wait until the march of General Porter's command the next day?

A. I did.

Q. At what hour, in point of fact, did he move from Warrenton Junction?

A. I should think the head of the column left about 4 o'clock in the morning; I am not positive about the hour.

Q. At what rate did the command march after it left Warrenton Junction?

A. I could not say at what rate. We started at or about 4 o'clock in the morning, and marched along quietly, without any apparent haste, meeting with no obstruction or detention, except that arising from the wagons we found in the road. The head of the column arrived at Bristoe Station about 10 o'clock, I should judge.

Q. At what point did you overtake the wagons, and how many of them do you suppose there were?

A. I do not recollect. There was a large park of wagons near Warrenton Junction—about half way between Catlett's Station and Warrenton Junction—which left for Bristoe Station at daylight. We overtook those wagons. They were in park when I passed down to Warrenton Junction the previous evening; therefore, I can not tell when we overtook the end of the train which I had passed near Catlett's Station the evening before.

Q. What is the meaning of the term "in park?"

A. In camp.

Q. Had General Porter's command marched at 1 o'clock in the morning would he or would he not have passed those wagons in camp?

A. He would have passed them in camp, probably.

Q. Was or was not the march throughout at the usual rate at which troops move, or was it slower?

A. It was at the rate at which troops would move if there was no necessity for rapid movement.

This must be accepted as clearly showing that had Porter moved at 1 o'clock as ordered he would have found no wagon train in the road—no "lion in the way." But by his delay he did encounter the wagons which came back into the road at daylight.

Now, what of the darkness of the night and the exhaustion of his troops? The night was undoubtedly dark and his troops had done some marching, but nothing like what had been done by the Army of Virginia; nothing either like what was being done by the confederate army.

Porter's corps had lain at Harrison's Landing since the 1st day of July, and had marched from Falmouth to Warrenton Junction during the preceding five days—not over 35 miles—an average of 7 miles per day.

Sykes's division had been at Warrenton Junction since 10 o'clock a. m., and Morell's came up before dark. It was undoubtedly a pleasant thing for Porter's command to be allowed to sleep that night till 3 o'clock. But remember it was a time of great peril, one-half of the confederate army was upon the communications of the Army of Virginia and between Pope and Washington. What if in the morning Jackson should turn and fall upon Hooker, who was out of ammunition? If, however, Jackson was between Pope and Washington, so Pope was between Jackson and Longstreet, and as an enterprising captain he wanted to overtake and crush Jackson before Longstreet could join him.

Remember, also, in connection with this order to march at 1 o'clock, that the profession of arms calls for hardships and sufferings; for fatigning marches and heroic daring; for privations of every kind; for hunger and thirst, and in the final struggle for death itself. War is no holiday, and successful war was never waged by the sluggard or the feeble in spirit. It always calls for energy and activity. We were told more than a hundred years ago that "the battle is not to the strong alone, but to the vigilant, the active, and the brave."

In determining the value of Porter's excuse—that the night was dark and his troops tired—we can do no better than show what Jackson's forces did on that same night and the night preceding, which was equally dark.

In his report of that campaign, after telling how he reached Bristoe Station on the night of the 26th, Jackson says, on page 643, volume 12, part 2, War Records:

Learning that the enemy had collected at Manassas Junction, a station about 4 miles distant, stores of great value, I decided it important that no time should be lost in securing them. Notwithstanding the darkness of the night and the fatiguing march since dawn would be over 30 miles before reaching the junction, Brigadier-General Trimble volunteered to proceed there forthwith. * * * Major-General Stuart, with a portion of his cavalry, was subsequently directed to move forward and, as ranking officer, to take command of the expedition. The duty was cheerfully undertaken by all who were assigned to it, and most promptly and successfully executed.

Now here is a lesson in war for General Porter and his apologists. Thirty miles in a day and a night's march against 35 miles in five days; for Porter's men who were too tired to be called at 1 o'clock. But, says some one, this was the night before, and it might not have been as dark. Very well; let us see what Jackson's forces did the next night, the very night Porter was ordered to move at 1 o'clock.

General Taliaferro, commanding Jackson's division, in his report, page 656, volume 12, part 2, War Records, says:

At night (27th) Major-General Ewell, who had been fighting during the evening at Bristoe Station—

The fight with Hooker—

having crossed Muddy Creek, by direction of Major-General Jackson, I moved my division with the entire train across to the Warrenton and Alexandria turnpike, pursuing the old military road to Sudley Mill, and at daybreak halted on the battlefield of July 21, 1861.

Here was a march of 9 or 10 miles by one division. General Early, who made the report of the operations of Ewell's division, the latter officer having been wounded in the battle of the 28th, after speaking of the affair with Hooker in the evening at Bristoe Station, says:

Shortly after dark, under orders from General Ewell, I moved to Manassas Junction.

* * * * * * *

As soon as the troops of the division were supplied with provisions at Manassas, of which they stood in great need, they were moved in the direction of Centreville toward Bull Run, and the several brigades bivouacked separately between Manassas and Bull Run.—War Records, page 710, volume 12, part 2.

Here was the movement of another division, four miles to Manassas and thence on toward Centreville, probably 9 or 10 miles.

General A. P. Hill, in his report, on page 670, War Records, volume 12, part 2, speaking of his crossing of the Rappahannock and the brisk engagement that attended it, says:

At nightfall I was relieved by General Hood, and the next morning commenced the flank movement to Manassas. A march of 54 miles was made in two days. Wednesday morning (27th), at Manassas, Branch's brigade had a sharp encounter with a battery supported by the Twelfth Pennsylvania Cavalry. They were soon dispersed.

* * * * * * *

That night about 12 o'clock the depot buildings, with an immense amount of commissary stores and about two miles of loaded freight cars, were burned, and at 1 o'clock I moved my division to Centreville.

The very hour Porter was ordered to move. Thus do we see every division under Jackson marching as great or a greater distance that night than was asked of Porter. This fact alone shows the complete invalidity of Porter's excuse that the night was dark. Why, here were the troops of the confederate army, some of them marching 30 miles in one day, and others 54 miles in two days, and then making these night marches in order to deal their blows and then elude the pursuit of their adversary till the reserve under Longstreet could come up. Verily, this was war. But Fitz-John Porter slept—"slept while the enemy sowed tares and went his way." Now, let us see at just what time he put his column in motion under this order to move at 1 o'clock. Lieutenant-Colonel Buchanan, Third Indiana Cavalry, on page 603, board record, says:

Q. What conversation had you with General Porter before he started off to Bristoe Station?

A. On the evening before he started somebody gave me an order to be in readiness to move at 3 o'clock in the morning. I was in front of General Porter's headquarters at 3 o'clock in the morning, but I saw no one until after the break of day. Then some one came to me and told me to let the men get their breakfasts and let their horses be fed. That was done, and I immediately went back to the place I occupied. Some time afterward, after sunrise, I saw General Porter. I wanted to go back to Fredericksburg to my regiment. I only had about ninety men with me, and I expected to go back the day before. I rode out with him in the woods, where he was in camp, until we got into an open field.

He asked me to send a detachment of the command I had forward to clear the road toward Bristoe Station two or three miles. This was done. I waited some little time, and the infantry began to move. About that time he handed me a letter, and directed me to give it to General Burnside, and told me I could go. I started toward Fredericksburg; he sent an aid after me and brought me back, and told me that he was apprehensive that I might be captured. He told me to say to General Burnside—I can not get his language—but the idea was that there was no disaster that was very threatening as yet, and he hoped for the best.

He did not start till after sunrise. But let us read the letter he sent to Burnside, which, it seem she had written the night before. It is as follows:

WARRENTON JUNCTION, August 27, 1862—4 p. m.

General BURNSIDE, Falmouth:

I send you the last order from General Pope, which indicates the future as well as the present. Wagons are rolling along rapidly to the rear, as if a mighty power was propelling them. I see no cause for alarm, though I think this order may cause it.

* * * * * * *

We are working now to get behind Bull Run, and, I presume, will be there in a few days if strategy don't use us up. The strategy is magnificent and tactics in the inverse proportion. I would like some of my ambulances. I would like, also, to be ordered to return to Fredericksburg and to push toward Hanover, or, with a large force to strike at Orange Court-House. I wish Sumner was at Washington, and up near the Monocacy with good batteries. I do not doubt the enemy have large amounts of supplies provided for them, and I believe they have a contempt for this Army of Virginia. I wish myself away from it with all our old Army of the Potomac, and so do our companions.

* * * * * * *

There is no grain here to-day or anywhere, and this army is wretchedly supplied in that line. Pope says he never could get enough. Most of this is private.

F. J. PORTER.

But if you can get me away, please do so. Make what use of this you choose, so it does good.

F. J. P.

This letter was written about five hours before he received the order to march at 1 o'clock, and discloses very fully Porter's animus toward Pope.

It is most insubordinate in tone from beginning to end. He does not conceal his contempt for the Army of Virginia and for its commander. He freely ridicules both his strategy and tactics, wishes himself away, and appeals to Burnside to get him away. And then, as if fearful he may have gone too far, he makes it half private. This letter, when taken with his other of the 26th, clearly shows a disobedient and treacherous spirit; and when we find him paying no attention to this peremptory order to move at 1 o'clock, and find him not starting till after sunrise, past the time he was ordered to be at Bristoe, which place he did not reach till after 10 o'clock, and at the same time find all his excuses mere pretenses, can there be any doubt of his deliberate intention not to help Pope in his struggle with the enemy, at least not to help him gain a victory?

The court-martial found him guilty of disobedience of this order. How could it have done otherwise? And how can any fair-minded man fail to say that he was, indeed, most guilty, and under the ninth article of war might have been legally called upon to suffer death? But this was only the beginning of his disobedience. Let us now follow him to the battlefield of August 29. But before doing so you should read the following letters to General Burnside. The first must have been written so soon as he arrived at Bristoe as he himself says his column had not then come up—and General Pope testified that it did not arrive till 10.45:

BRISTOE, 9.30 A. M., August 28, 1862.

My command will soon be up, and will at once go into position. Hooker drove Ewell some 3 miles, and Pope says McDowell intercepted Longstreet, so that without a long detour he can not join Ewell, Jackson, and A. P. Hill, who are, or supposed to be, at Manassas.

* * * * * * *

I hope for the best, and my lucky star is always up about my birthday, the 31st, and hope Mc's is up also. You will hear of us soon by way of Alexandria.

Ever yours,

F. J. P.

General BURNSIDE, Falmouth.

It may be matter of wonder, but not content with the foregoing he writes Burnside again at 1 p. m.

The significant thing about these letters, aside from the frequent allusions to McClellan, is that feature of them which amounts to a continued sneer at Pope and a constant longing to get back to Alexandria. Here is the next letter sent at once by Burnside to Halleck:

FALMOUTH, August 29, 1862—1 p. m.

To Maj. Gen. H. W. HALLECK, General-in-Chief, and Maj. Gen. G. B. MCCLELLAN, Alexandria:

The following just received from Porter, 4 miles from Manassas, the 28th, 2 p. m.:

"All that talk about bagging Jackson, &c., was bosh. That enormous gap—Manassas—was left open, and the enemy jumped through; and the story of McDowell having cut off Longstreet had no good foundation. The enemy have destroyed all our bridges, burnt trains, &c., and made this army rush back to look at its line of communication, and find us bare of subsistence. We are far from Alexandria——

"Considering the importance of transportion——

"your supply-train of forty wagons is here, but I can't find them.

"There is a report that Jackson is at Centreville, which you can believe or not. The enemy destroyed an immense amount of property at Manassas—cars and supplies. I expect the next thing will be a raid on our rear by way of Warrenton by Longstreet, who was cut off.

"F. J. PORTER, Major-General."

This is the latest news.

A. E. BURNSIDE, Major-General.

We have seen that on the night of the 27th Jackson's division moved to Groveton and took position for the impending battle. Hill went to Centreville to distract Pope and for the mischief he could do. Ewell bivouacked near Bull Run. Pope was pursuing, and on the night of the 28th had his headquarters at Bull Run. He had ordered McDowell to Gainesville and Ricketts to Thoroughfare Gap, through which Longstreet must come, for he was still beyond the Bull Run Mountains. Pope wanted to get hold of Jackson and crush him before Longstreet could come up, and at 3 o'clock in the morning of the 29th this vigilant and resolute commander of the Army of Virginia, who displayed an energy and activity in this campaign that ought to have won him the victory, and would had he been cordially supported, issued to General Porter the following order:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Near Bull Run, August 29, 1862—3 a. m.

GENERAL: McDowell has intercepted the retreat of Jackson. Sigel is immediately on the right of McDowell. Kearny and Hooker march to attack the enemy's rear at early dawn. Major-General Pope directs you to move upon Centreville at the first dawn of day with your whole command, leaving your trains to follow. It is very important that you should be here at a very early hour in the morning. A severe engagement is likely to take place, and your presence is necessary.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Now what does Porter do? Does he obey this order? He is ordered to move "at the first dawn of day." It was sunrise August 29 at 5.26, and "the first dawn" more than an hour earlier. At 6 o'clock he seats himself to write the following letter to Burnside, saying he should be off in half an hour. When he did get off does not appear. And here again is found the same contemptuous sneer at Pope, the same apparent disgust at his surroundings, and the same strange turning of his heart in hope to McClellan:

BRISTOE, 6 a. m., 29th.

GENERAL BURNSIDE: Shall be off in half an hour. * * * Heintzelman and Reno at Centreville, where they marched yesterday.

Pope went to Centreville with the last two as a body-guard, at the time not knowing where was the enemy and where Sigel was fighting—within 8 miles of him and in sight. Comment is unnecessary. * * * I hope Mac. is working, and will soon get out of this. * * * Your train of forty wagons can not be found—— but I expect they know what they are doing, which is more than any one here or anywhere knows.

F. J. P.

Pope a little later, finding McDowell was not at Gainesville, as he supposed, first sent a verbal order to Porter to move on that point instead of Centreville, and then the following written order. It was of the very first importance that Gainesville should be held, as it lay on the line of Longstreet's approach.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, August 29, 1862.

Push forward with your corps and King's division, which you will take with you, upon Gainesville. I am following the enemy down the Warrenton turnpike. Be expeditious, or we will lose much.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

Maj. Gen. FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

We have seen how Porter loitered on the order to move "at the first dawn of day," how he took time after 6 o'clock to write the fifth libelous letter about his superior officer. Now let us see if he obeyed this last order. The court-martial said he did not. Had this order been promptly obeyed Porter would have intercepted Longstreet, or at least engaged him, somewhere on the turnpike, and have left Jackson to be dealt with by Pope.

Soon after giving this order, McDowell complained to Pope about the detachment of King's division, whereupon Pope issued to both McDowell and Porter the following joint order to move on Gainesville, the very key to the situation on that day. Pope had ordered McDowell there the day before; but finding he was not there he now tried to get both Porter and McDowell to march on that point:

[General Order No. 5.]

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, August 29, 1862.

GENERALS MCDOWELL AND PORTER: You will please move forward with your joint commands toward Gainesville. I sent General Porter written orders to that effect an hour and a half ago. Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno are moving on the Warrenton turnpike, and must now be not far from Gainesville. I desire that, as soon as communication is established between this force and your own, the whole command shall halt. It may be necessary to fall back behind Bull Run, at Centreville, to-night. I presume it will be so on account of our supplies. I have sent no orders of any description to Ricketts, and none to interfere in any way with the movements of McDowell's troops, except what I sent by his aid-de-camp last night, which were to hold his position on the Warrenton pike until the troops from here should fall upon the enemy's flank and rear. I do not even know Ricketts's position, as I have not been able to find out where General McDowell was until a late hour this morning. General McDowell will take immediate steps to communicate with General Ricketts, and instruct him to rejoin the other divisions of his corps as soon as practicable. If any considerable advantages are to be gained by departing from this order, it will not be strictly carried out. One thing must be had in view, that the troops must occupy a position from which they can reach Bull Run to-night or by morning. The indications are that the whole force of the enemy is moving in this direction at a pace that will bring them here by to-morrow night or next day. My own headquarters will be, for the present, with Heintzelman's corps or at this place.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

To Porter this was a repetition of the former order. It emphasized Pope's wish to occupy Gainesville—to intercept and hold off Longstreet.

McDowell, as the ranking officer, would have had command of Porter had they remained together; but under the discretionary clause in the order McDowell decided to move his corps with King's division directly to Groveton, where the battle, as he says in his testimony, seemed to be "at its height."

McDowell did this because his corps was back on the Sudley Spring road, behind that of Porter, and he thought he could soonest get it into action by moving it up that road in the direction of the fighting.

See his testimony (page 84, court record), in which, speaking of the time he and Porter were together at the head of Porter's column near Dawkin's Branch, he also says:

General Porter made a remark to me which showed me that he had no question but that the enemy was in his immediate front. I said to him: "You put your force in here, and I will take mine up the Sudley Spring road, on the left of the troops engaged at that point with the enemy," or words to that effect. I left General Porter with the belief and understanding that he would put his force in at that point.

* * * * * * *

Q. You have said that the accused made an observation to you which showed that he was satisfied that the enemy was in his immediate front; will you state what that observation was?

A. I do not know that I can repeat it exactly, and I do not know that the accused meant exactly what the remark might seem to imply. The observation was to this effect—putting his hand in the direction of the dust rising above the tops of the trees—"We can not go in there anywhere without getting into a fight."

Q. What reply did you make to that remark?

A. I think to this effect: "That is what we came here for."

Q. Were there any obstacles in the way of the advance on the part of General Porter's command on the flank of the enemy?

A. That depends upon what you would call obstacles. A wood is an obstacle.

Q. I mean insuperable obstacles, in a military sense.

A. I do not think we so regarded it at that time. I did not.

Q. Was or not the battle raging at that time?

A. The battle was raging on our right; that is, if you regard the line of the road from Bethlehem church to Gainesville to be substantially northwest, the battle was raging to the right and east of that line at Groveton.

* * * * * * *

Q. At what hour did you arrive upon the battlefield with your command and take part in the engagement?

A. I cannot say as to hours.

Q. As nearly as you can?

A. It was in the afternoon. I do not know at what time the sun set. I should not be able to fix the hour. It may have been 4 o'clock or 5 o'clock.

It seems that McDowell found a way into the fight; but what of Porter? The fact is undisputed that his corps lay all day in the precise position where McDowell left it, strung along the road from Dawkin's Branch back beyond Bethlehem church, with arms stacked and the men at rest. A couple of batteries, Hazlitt's and Waterman's, were posted at the head of the column and a couple of regiments thrown out as a picket. But wait, this statement is too favorable to Porter; his force did not all stay there; he actually ordered one brigade back to Manassas Junction. General Sturgis, one of Porter's officers, on the seven hundred and eleventh page, board record, says:

Q. You say you went a mile and a half beyond Bethlehem church toward Gainesville?

A. That is my recollection.

Q. What did you then do?

A. I reported to General Porter. I rode in advance of my brigade. I found troops occupying the road, and I got up as near as I could get and then halted my command, and then rode forward to tell General Porter that they were there. He said, "For the present let them lie there."

Q. What did you do then individually?

A. Well, I simply looked about to see what I could see. I was a stranger to the lay of the land, and the troops, and all that; so without getting off my horse I rode about from place to place watching the skirmishers, and among other things I took a glass and looked in the direction of the woods; about a mile beyond, which seemed to be the object of attention—beyond the skirmishers; there I saw a glint of light on a gun; and I remarked to General Porter that I thought they were probably putting a battery in position at that place, for I thought I had seen a gun.

Q. State what the conversation was?

A. I reported this fact of what I had seen to the general; he thought I was mistaken about it, but I was not mistaken, because it opened in a moment—at least a few shots were fired from that place—four, as I recollect.

Q. What force of the enemy did you see in that direction at that time?

A. I didn't see any of the enemy, at all.

Q. Then what did you do?

A. Then when they had fired, as near as I can recollect, about four shots from this piece, General Porter beckoned to me; I rode up to him and he directed me to take my command to Manassas Junction and take up a defensive position, inasmuch as the firing seemed to be receding on our right.

Q. What firing do you mean?

A. I mean the cannonading that had been going on for some time on our right, probably in the direction of Groveton.

Q. How long had you heard that cannonading?

A. I don't recollect exactly where I heard it first. My impression has been that I heard it all along the march from Manassas to General Porter's position. I do not recollect distinctly that I did hear it, but I know I heard it all the time after I arrived there until I left.

Q. What time of day was this that you received the order to move back with your command to Manassas Junction?

A. I have no way of fixing the time of day. I have carried in my mind the impression that it was more about the middle of the day—about 1 o'clock.

Q. What did you do when you received that order?

A. I sent word to General Piatt to move back to Manassas Junction and that I would join him there.

Q. Do you know whether your order was obeyed?

A. Yes; it was obeyed.

With the battle raging on the right and under orders to advance, Porter halted, and at four shots from a gun "about a mile" away ordered one brigade two miles to the rear to intrench itself.

But this was not marching on Gainsville. What was his excuse for not going farther? He claims that Longstreet was in his immediate front; and, first, that he could not have gone farther if he had tried. He does not claim that he tried. And, second, that he was aiding in the most effectual manner possible the fortunes of the day by holding Longstreet in his front and keeping him off from Pope. If it were true that with his twelve thousand men he was really holding twenty-five thousand under Longstreet, or, having taken the proper means to ascertain, honestly supposed he was, then under the discretionary clause in the order he would be justified so far as this order is concerned. But the infirmity of this excuse is it is not true. In the first place he took no means whatever to ascertain whether or not there really was a large force in his front. Every soldier knows that not having positive information, the only way to ascertain the strength of the enemy is to push up and feel of him.

There is no pretense that Porter did this at any time during the day.

The only order that he issued during the entire day that gives the remotest hint of a purpose to advance, except one just at night, of which I will soon speak, is the following; and that sounds more like retreating than advancing:

General MORELL: Push over to the aid of Sigel and strike in his rear. If you reach a road up which King is moving, and he has got ahead of you, let him pass; but see if you can give help to Sigel. If you find him retiring, move back toward Manassas, and should necessity require it, and you do not hear from me, push to Centreville. If you find the direct road filled, take the road via Union Mills, which is to the right as you return.

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

Look to the points of the compass.

General Morell, a witness called by Porter himself, at the court-martial, on page 141, volume 1, evidently speaking of this order, says:

After awhile I saw General McDowell and General Porter riding together. They passed off to our right into the woods toward the railroad, and after a time General Porter returned, and I think alone, and gave me orders to move my command to the right over the railroad. I started there and got one brigade, and I think one battery, over the railroad, passing through a clearing, and had got to the edge of the woods on the other side of it, when I received orders to return to my former position.

I led the men back, and as the head of the column was in front of Hazlitt's battery, which had been put in position, we received a shot from the enemy's artillery directly in front of us. I got the infantry back of the batteries under cover of the bushes and the crest of the ridge, and posted Waterman's battery on the opposite side of the Gainesville road, and we remained in that position most of the day.

"Off to the right into the woods" and "over the railroad" was in the direction of Sigel. While McDowell was there Porter put on the appearance of doing something. But after he was gone the order was countermanded. Remember, Porter's advance was under Morell, who says they remained "under cover of the bushes and the crest of the ridge most of the day." Now, the truth is that until late in the afternoon there was nothing in Porter's front but cavalry pickets, and what does infantry, when in earnest, care for cavalry? But before examining the evidence on this point let us for just a moment recur to this thrice-given order to Porter to move on Gainesville. Remember Porter was at Bristoe on the morning of the 29th. From Bristoe to Manassas Junction is short 4 miles. From the junction to the left of our line at Groveton, not over 5 miles, 9 in all. Longstreet camped that night at Thoroughfare Gap west of the mountains. Ricketts's division was guarding the gap and had an engagement with Longstreet's advance under General Jones just at night and did not retire till after dark, which let Jones through late that night.

Longstreet had sent Wilcox with his own and Featherston's and Pryor's brigades to Hopewell Gap, 3 miles to the north, and they reached this side between 11 and 12 o'clock. All the rest of Longstreet's corps slept on the other side of the mountain. (See reports of Lee, who was with Longstreet, and of Jones and Wilcox, volume 12, part 2, pages 556, 578, 598.) From Thoroughfare Gap to Groveton is strong 10 miles, and the brigades at Hopewell Gap nearly 2 miles farther, thus leaving Longstreet's whole corps farther from the field of action than was Porter. Now, will the admirers of Fitz-John Porter, who, it must be admitted, was every inch a soldier when he did his best, allow him to be outdone by Longstreet, especially when he was ordered to "move at the first dawn of day," and was told that "a severe engagement was likely to take place?" It may furnish Porter's friends no explanation, but it should be stated that the case does not show that Longstreet before starting that morning sat down at 6 o'clock and wrote a sneering letter about his commanding general.

Do not these distances make it perfectly plain that if Porter had been as active as Longstreet he would have met him somewhere between Gainesville and Groveton? And if overpowered he could have fallen back upon Pope's left, which would have brought him upon the ridge afterward taken by General Stuart and immediately occupied by Longstreet's artillery with terrible effect upon the Union line on both days of the battle. Or if he had failed to intercept him at the very head of his column he could at least have struck him on the flank as he was passing along the turnpike, for Porter's road led straight to the turnpike at Gainesville and again between Gainesville and Groveton.

Had he done this at any time between 2 and 3 o'clock he would have prevented any effectual re-enforcement of Jackson by Longstreet. This he was ordered to do, but he did not do it; nor did he make any effort whatever to do it.

Now, the truth is, with the exception of the three brigades under Jones, Longstreet did not unite with Jackson till considerably after noon, certainly as late as 1 o'clock. I do not forget the report made by General Buford of the seventeen regiments passing through Gainesville at 9.30 a. m. But these must have been Jones's three brigades which came through the gap the night before. That Longstreet did not reach Jackson's right till about 1 o'clock is shown by the following facts about which there seems to be no dispute: General Stuart says in his memorandum of facts and in his report (volume 12, part 2, pages 736-740) that he spent the night with General Jackson near Sudley's mill; that in the morning about 10 o'clock an attack was made upon General Jackson's baggage, which he made disposition to repulse; and then, in accordance with Jackson's wishes, after 10 o'clock, he started to find Longstreet; and, to use his exact language, he says:

I met with the head of General Longstreet's column between Hay Market and Gainesville, and there communicated to the commanding general General Jackson's position and the enemy's. I then passed the cavalry through the column, so as to place it on Longstreet's right flank, and advanced directly toward Manassas, while the column kept directly down the pike to join General Jackson's right.

This report develops three important facts:

1. The head of Longstreet's column was west of Gainesville as late as about 12 o'clock, for it must have taken Stuart the best part of two hours to move his command the 6 or 7 miles from Sudley's mill to this point.

2. Longstreet went straight down the pike to Jackson's right at Groveton, not toward Porter at all.

3. Stuart went toward Manassas, right down the road toward Porter.

Now, holding fast to these facts, let us look a little farther into Stuart's report:

General Robertson, who was sent to reconnoiter farther down the road toward Manassas, reported the enemy in his front. The prolongation of his line of march would have passed through my position, which was a very fine one for artillery, as well as observation, and struck Longstreet in flank. I waited his approach long enough to ascertain that there was at least an army corps, at the same time keeping detachments of cavalry dragging brush down the road from the direction of Gainesville so as to deceive the enemy—a ruse which Porter's report shows was successful—and notified the commanding general, then opposite me on the turnpike, that Longstreet's flank and rear were seriously threatened, and of the importance of the ridge I then held.

Now, where was this ridge, this "fine place for artillery and observation?" Remember he "notified the commanding general opposite on the turnpike." This ridge was up near the turnpike and was really the key to the situation on the left on both days. It is known in the history of the battle as "Stuart Hill," and was between 1 and 2 miles from the head of Porter's column at Dawkin's Branch. Now, let us look again into Stuart's report:

Immediately upon the receipt of that intelligence, Jenkins's, Kemper's, and D. R. Jones's brigades and several pieces of artillery were ordered to me by General Longstreet, and being placed in position fronting Bristoe, awaited the enemy's advance. After exchanging a few shots with rifle-pieces, this corps withdrew toward Manassas."

The use of rifle-pieces indicates long range. These were the shots that fell in front of Porter when he ordered Sturgis back to Manassas to intrench. Remember Sturgis says the glint of light on the gun which he saw through his glass was "about a mile beyond;" and that "he didn't see any of the enemy at all." These were the shots, too, that fell in front of Morell when he put his men into the bushes and behind the hill. Stuart says, "This corps withdrew toward Manassas"—an impression he probably got from the movement of Sturgis's brigade back to Manassas, the rest of the men being hid away. Now, up to this time, which Sturgis says was about 1 o'clock, and which, from Stuart's march from Sudley Mill to beyond Gainesville and back to that point, must have made it as late or later, there was no infantry in front of Porter, and we have no account of but four shots at him from that gun "about a mile" away. And remember that Stuart was on Longstreet's right flank; that it was his particular business to protect that flank; hence, he must be accepted as authority upon what took place in Porter's front.

Remember, also, that even Stuart's position was not in the immediate front of Porter, but up "opposite the turnpike" on Longstreet's right flank, at least a mile from him. While Stuart's position was thus remote from Porter, he did have Robertson's videttes in Porter's front, and had Rosser's cavalry "dragging brush down the road from the direction of Gainesville so as to deceive the enemy" by raising a dust, indicating, of course, an approaching column.

Speaking of this, Colonel Rosser says, on page 1152, board record:

Longstreet's command was coming in in a very forced and disordered march from the direction of Thoroughfare Gap, moving rapidly and straggling badly. * * * When Stuart joined me he notified me that the enemy was moving upon our right flank, and ordered me to move my command up and down the dusty road, and to drag brush, and thus create a heavy dust as though troops were in motion. I kept this up at least four or five hours.

This testimony of Rosser, who was Porter's witness, shows two things: First, that there was no infantry in Porter's front and none moving down toward him, but that they raised a dust to make him think there was; and, second, it shows what an easy prey Longstreet's straggling column would have been to a vigorous assault by Porter as it went hurrying down the pike to Jackson. But Porter was lying in the shade back of Dawkin's Branch with nothing on this road, leading straight up to the pike, but cavalry videttes and brush and dust. Nor was there any infantry in his front till late in the day, and then only for a little time.

I do not forget that Colonel Marshall, on Porter's picket line, says he saw infantry in their front early in the afternoon, but attention to the following facts will show him mistaken as to time. That a force of infantry went down from the pike toward Porter's front that afternoon is true. Some think it was Jones's division which formed the extreme right of Longstreet's line; but that can not have been, for Stuart says Jenkins's brigade, which was a part of Jones's division, co-operated with the batteries on Stuart Hill in the repulse of a force coming through a cornfield late in the day, which must have been on Pope's extreme left, between 1 and 2 miles from Porter's column. Besides, Jones in his report makes no mention of any force in his front answering to the location of Porter's corps.

Whose troops, then, did go down toward Porter and at what time and how long did they remain? Lee says when Stuart reported this large force on his right he sent General Wilcox in that direction, and Wilcox in his report (volume 12, part 2, page 598, War Records) says:

At 4.30 or 5 p. m. the three brigades were moved across to the right of the turnpike a mile or more to the Manassas Gap Railroad. While there, musketry was heard to our left on the turnpike. This firing continued with more or less vivacity till sundown. Now the command was ordered back to the turnpike and forward on this to the support of General Hood, who had become engaged with the enemy.

Wilcox went down "a mile or more to the Manassas Gap Railroad," just where Colonel Marshall saw the enemy, but finding nothing of a threatening character he went back to the support of General Hood on the pike. The confederate commander did not know that that force beyond Dawkin's Branch was not on the war path that day; that it was a harmless force; that it had no fangs except the fangs of envy and jealousy, else he had not sent General Wilcox out to reconnoiter it; for Pope in his part of the field was furnishing business for them all, as Wilcox's quick return to the support of Hood, who had become engaged, clearly shows.

Now, Hood commanded one of the divisions of Longstreet's corps, which Porter claims he held in his front that day and kept from attacking Pope. Wilcox commanded another. There were five brigades in these two divisions and eleven brigades in his whole corps—(Longstreet's report, volume 12, part 2, page 565, and his testimony, board record, page 59). Upon the authority of Wilcox's report five of these brigades are found crowding back Pope's left. Upon the authority of General Stuart, Jenkins's brigade of Jones's division took a hand also; and it will be seen by the following reports of Lee and Longstreet that Evans's and Hunton's brigades were also engaged, eight out of the eleven brigades, including also Stribling's battery on Longstreet's right and Walton's between him and Jackson on his left, and the artillery also that was on Stuart Hill, which he reported as so effective, was all of Longstreet's corps, and all pouring in upon Pope's left; and this is the way Porter kept Longstreet off from Pope that day. But to these reports, and first that of General Lee, volume 12, part 2, page 556:

Longstreet entered the turnpike near Gainesville, and, moving down toward Groveton, the head of his column came upon the field in rear of the enemy's left, which had already opened with artillery upon Jackson's right, as previously described. He immediately placed some batteries in position, but before he could complete his dispositions to attack the enemy withdrew, not, however, without loss from our artillery. Longstreet took position on the right of Jackson, Hood's two brigades, supported by Evans's, being deployed across the turnpike and at right angles to it. These troops were supported on the left by three brigades under General Wilcox, and by a like force on the right under General Kemper; D. R. Jones's division formed the extreme right of the line resting on the Manassas Gap Railroad. * * * Colonel Walton placed a part of his artillery upon a commanding position between the lines of Generals Jackson and Longstreet by order of the latter and engaged the enemy vigorously for several hours.

* * * * * * *

While the battle was raging on Jackson's left General Longstreet ordered Hood and Evans to advance, but before the order could be obeyed Hood himself was attacked and his command became warmly engaged. General Wilcox was recalled from the right and ordered to advance on Hood's left, and one of Kemper's brigades, under Colonel Hunton, moved forward on his right. The enemy was repulsed by Hood, after a severe contest, and fell back closely followed by our troops. The battle continued until 9 p. m.—the enemy retreating until he reached a strong position, which he held with a large force.

Here make a note that Lee says: "Moving to the sound of cannon, Longstreet went straight down the pike and took position on the right of Jackson," which was wholly east of the pike and more than two miles from the head of Porter's column. Make a note, also, that Lee names seven brigades and Walton's artillery and Hood's batteries, all of Longstreet's corps, as taking part against Pope in what he speaks of as a "severe contest." Now to Longstreet's report. He says:

Early on the 29th the columns were united and the advance to join General Jackson was resumed. The noise of battle was heard before we reached Gainesville. The march was quickened to the extent of our capacity. The excitement of battle seemed to give new life and strength to our jaded men, and the head of my column soon reached a position in rear of the enemy's left flank, and within easy cannon-shot. On approaching the field some of Brigadier-General Hood's batteries were ordered into position, and his division was deployed on the right and left of the turnpike, at right angles with it, and supported by Brigadier-General Evans's brigade. Before these batteries could open the enemy discovered our movements and withdrew his left. Another battery (Captain Stribling's) was placed upon a commanding position to my right, which played upon the rear of the enemy's left and drove him entirely from that part of the field. He changed his front rapidly, so as to meet the advance of Hood and Evans.

* * * * * * *

The enemy about 4 o'clock in the afternoon began to press forward against General Jackson's position. Wilcox's brigades were moved back to their former position, and Hood's two brigades, supported by Evans, were quickly pressed forward to the attack. At the same time Wilcox's three brigades made a like advance, as also Hunton's brigade of Kemper's command. These movements were executed with commendable zeal and ability. Hood, supported by Evans, made a gallant attack, driving the enemy back, until 9 o'clock at night.

Thus does Longstreet corroborate Lee, and place his corps on Jackson's right, deployed at right angles across the pike, with fully one-half of it north of the pike, and from the very moment of its arrival engaged with Pope's left.

There must by this time be a curiosity to know whose troops were opposite Longstreet that day. They were the Pennsylvania reserves under the gallant Reynolds, who lets a flood of light on this subject in both his report and his testimony before the court-martial. It nicks exactly with the reports of Lee and Longstreet. His testimony (page 166, volume 1, court record) is as follows:

Q. Do you, or not, know where the enemy's right flank was on the afternoon of the 29th, say, toward sunset?

A. I was on the extreme left of our troops, facing the enemy, and their right toward sunset had been extended across the pike, with fresh troops coming down the Warrenton turnpike; but up to 12 or 1 o'clock it was not across the pike, and I had myself made an attack on their right with my division, but was obliged to change front to meet the enemy coming down the Warrenton pike. I was forming my troops parallel to the pike to attack the enemy's right, but was obliged to change from front to rear on the right to face the troops coming down the turnpike. That was, I suppose, as late as 1 o'clock; and they continued to come in there till they formed and extended across the pike.

This agrees exactly with Longstreet, who says the enemy "changed his front rapidly so as to meet the advance of Hood and Evans." It also shows the important fact that Reynolds had formed parallel with the pike and was just ready to move on Jackson's right flank when Longstreet came down the pike and took him in flank and rear, compelling him to change front and fall back. It also shows the further important fact, that this was not till 1 o'clock p. m., all of which in turn shows that had Porter been "expeditious," as Pope enjoined in his order that morning, he would have collared Longstreet somewhere on the pike and have left Reynolds free to carry out his designs upon Jackson.

Napoleon, when asked for the reason why he always whipped the Austrians, said: "It was because they did not understand the value of five minutes of time." Now, who can tell what the result might have been had Reynolds only been given time to have got home on Jackson's flank, for he already had a battery playing upon it. But Porter was loafing beyond Dawkin's Branch. It was 1 o'clock, and Longstreet was forming in Reynolds's front. Speaking of this crisis in his report, page 393, volume 12, part 2, War Records, Reynolds says:

The whole fire of the enemy was now concentrated on the extreme right of my division, and, unsupported there, the battery was obliged to retire with considerable loss in both horses and men, and the division fell back to connect with Schenck.

Later in the day, General Pope arriving on the right from Centreville renewed the attack on the enemy and drove him some distance.

My division was directed to threaten the enemy's right and rear, which it proceeded to do under a heavy fire of artillery from the ridge to the left of the pike.

Generals Seymour and Jackson led their brigades in advance, but notwithstanding all the steadiness and courage shown by the men they were compelled to fall back before the heavy artillery and musketry which met them on both the front and left flank, and the division resumed its original position.

Hatch's division of McDowell's corps was also engaged with Longstreet on the pike that night.

In his report (volume 12, part 2, page 367) General Hatch says:

The struggle lasting some three-quarters of an hour was a desperate one, being in many instances a hand-to-hand conflict.

No one fails to see that Reynolds, Longstreet, and Lee speak in their reports of the same events. Observe, also, that Reynolds fixes Longstreet's arrival at 1 o'clock, which, taken with Stuart's report and memoranda that he went from Sudley's mill after 10 o'clock and met the head of Longstreet's column beyond Gainesville, must make reasonably certain that he did not arrive before that time. This settles one of the principal disputes in the case. And the other great question of fact, namely, whether Longstreet's corps was on the pike and engaged with Pope's left, or over in front of Porter, is equally well settled by the reports of Lee and Longstreet and Reynolds, coupled with the testimony of the latter before the court-martial in 1862, when the whole affair was fresh.

I do not forget that the confederate officers in their testimony before the advisory board in 1878 put Longstreet's arrival at an earlier hour and placed his corps more over toward Porter.

But I have chosen to fasten upon and make prominent these statements in their official reports made at the time, believing that the deliberate judgment of mankind will accept them as far more satisfactory than this attempt, sixteen years afterward, to bring something new on this subject from out the slippery depths of recollection, upon the mere "guess of memory."

Now, before going back to Porter, just a word as to the character of the fighting that day further out on Pope's right; and this for the reason that the advisory board would have it understood in their report that there was not much of a battle; not enough to have given Porter to understand as a soldier that his comrades-in-arms needed his help. Here is the way they attempt to smooth it over.

The judgment of the court-martial upon General Porter's conduct was evidently based upon greatly erroneous impressions, not only respecting what that conduct really was, and the orders under which he was acting, but also respecting all the circumstances under which he acted. Especially was this true in respect to the character of the battle on the 29th of August. That battle consisted of a number of sharp and gallant combats between small portions of the opposing forces. Those combats were of short duration and were separated by long intervals of simple skirmishing and artillery duels. Until after 6 o'clock only a small part of the troops on either side were engaged at any time during the afternoon. Then, about sunset, one additional division on each side was engaged near Groveton. The musketry of that last contest and the yells of the confederate troops about dark were distinctly heard by the officers of Porter's corps; but at no other time during all that afternoon was the volume of musketry such that it could be heard at the position of Porter's troops. No sound but that of artillery was heard by them during all those hours when Porter was understood by the court-martial to have been listening to the sound of a furious battle raging immediately to his right. And those sounds of artillery were by no means such as to indicate a general battle.

Now, this very attempt not only shows that this board had gone into the whitewashing business, but it amounts in itself to a confession that had there really been a battle that day on his right, as a true soldier he was not justified in lying by and lifting no hand to help. Hence the importance of the question, was there really a battle that day? Here is an extract from A. P. Hill's report (volume 12, part 2, page 670, War Records):

Friday morning (29th), in accordance with orders from General Jackson I occupied the line of the unfinished railroad. * * * The evident intention of the enemy this day was to turn our left and overwhelm Jackson's corps before Longstreet came up; and to accomplish this the most persistent and furious onsets were made by column after column of infantry accompanied by numerous batteries of artillery. Soon my reserves were all in, and up to 6 o'clock my division, assisted by the Louisiana brigade commanded by Colonel Forno, with a heroic courage and obstinacy, had met and repulsed six distinct and separate assaults, a portion of the time the majority of the men being without a cartridge.

Surely this report of Hill sounds quite like the description of a battle. It would seem that "seven hours' unremitted fighting," in which "all the reserves were in," and in which "the most persistent and furious onsets were made by column after column of infantry, accompanied by numerous batteries of artillery," might properly enough be called a battle. And no old soldier will say that "six separate and distinct assaults" might not well be spoken of by this distinguished confederate leader as "almost without parallel." One or two assaults generally satisfies the assailants or carries the position.

Jackson, in his report, volume 12, part 2, page 464, says:

Thomas attacked the exultant enemy with vigor, and drove him back across the railroad with great slaughter. General McGowan reports that the opposing forces at one time delivered their volleys into each other at the distance of ten paces. Assault after assault was made on the left, exhibiting on the part of the enemy great pertinacity and determination.

General Lee says of the fighting on his left that day:

The contest was close and obstinate. General Gregg, who was most exposed, was re-enforced by Hays's brigade, and successfully and gallantly resisted the attack of the enemy until the ammunition of his brigade being exhausted and all his field officers but two killed and wounded, it was relieved after several hours' severe fighting.

This was all between Jackson's corps and the right of Pope's line.

The fight between Reynolds's and Hatch's divisions, on Pope's left, and Longstreet has already been fully described in extracts from the reports of those officers, Lee speaking of it as a "severe contest," and both Lee and Longstreet saying that it lasted till 9 o'clock at night. There can be no doubt but that all these men thought there was a battle that day. "The sound of cannon announced" it to Lee when he was miles away, and Longstreet "heard the noise of battle before he reached Gainesville." Sturgis and McDowell were aware of it when with Porter early in the day, and even Burnside at Fredericksburg telegraphed to Washington twice that day that his advance reported a battle off to the north. In short, everybody within a radius of twenty miles but Fitz-John Porter thought there was a battle that day; and the truth is it was an obstinate and bloody one, Pope acting literally upon the order of the general-in-chief to "dispute every inch of ground and fight like the devil." Nor was Pope overdoing. The crisis was such that desperate fighting was necessary. The victorious army that had driven McClellan behind the gunboats at Harrison's Landing was bearing down upon the capital. Pope, in writing Halleck of this day's work, said:

We have fought a terrific battle. * * * We have lost not less than eight thousand men killed and wounded.—Conduct of War, supplement, part 2, page 196.

If further proof were requisite to show that a battle was fought on that 29th day of August, 1862, enough could be furnished from the reports of the general and field officers in both armies to fill a volume; but the mind intuitively shrinks from the sickening details and the ghastly scenes it would reveal. Besides enough has already been produced to lay bare the sophistry of the advisory board when they try to excuse Porter on the ground that while he was down there in the shade he did not know that a battle was raging on his right. But if more were wanted, Fitz-John Porter himself, over his own signature, shows not only the fallacy but the utter falsity of this claim of the board. During the long hours that Porter played the truant that day he sent four several dispatches to McDowell and King. Here are two of them:

GENERAL MCDOWELL OR KING: I have been wandering over the woods and failed to get a communication to you. Tell how matters go with you. The enemy is in strong force in front of me, and I wish to know your designs for to-night. If left to me I shall have to retire for food and water, which I can not get here. How goes the battle? It seems to go to our rear. The enemy are getting to our left.

F. J. PORTER,
Major-General Volunteers.

GENERALS MCDOWELL AND KING: I found it impossible to communicate by crossing the woods to Groveton. The enemy are in great force on this road, and as they appear to have driven our forces back, the fire of the enemy having advanced and ours retired, I have determined to withdraw to Manassas. I have attempted to communicate with McDowell and Sigel, but my messengers have run into the enemy. They have gathered artillery and cavalry and infantry, and the advancing masses of dust show the enemy coming in force. I am now going to the head of the column to see what is passing and how affairs are going, and will communicate with you. Had you not better send your train back?

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

Would Porter have asked "how goes the battle" unless he knew there was a battle? Would he have said, "As they appear to have driven our forces back, the firing of the enemy having advanced and ours retired, I have determined to withdraw to Manassas," if he did not know they were fighting?

Thus does Porter himself show the utter unreliability of these men of the advisory board. But these dispatches show another thing, and that is, instead of advancing as ordered he was intent upon falling back.

He says: "I shall have to retire for food and water, which I can not get here." But he did get both there, and staid all night because he saw it would make his treachery too plain if, under the circumstances, he fell back. "The advancing masses of dust show the enemy coming in force." But we have already seen that this was only the dust raised by Rosser's cavalry dragging brush up and down the road "four or five hours." "I have determined to withdraw to Manassas." "Had you not better send your train back." As much as to say, "Come, McDowell, let us get out of this." General Morell, at the head of the column, knowing the wishes of Porter, wrote him once during the day, "I think we had better retire."

But Porter does not quite dare to do that unless he can get McDowell started also, and writes back to Morell, "We can not retire while McDowell holds out;" and then writes McDowell that he has "determined to withdraw to Manassas," thus giving McDowell to understand that he is going to leave his flank exposed to a large force, which he tells McDowell is in his front. And this, not because he has been attacked and can not hold his ground, but because there is a cloud of dust in his front. Think of it; a corps commander, with twelve thousand troops, about to retire from the field, because a few cavalrymen, who will have their practical joke, are dragging brush up and down the road. But had there really been a large force in Porter's front, and he had retired, as he notified McDowell he had determined to do, it would have compelled McDowell to retire also. And thus did Porter tell McDowell these sailors' yarns in the hope that McDowell would get discouraged and join him in a retrograde movement.

But McDowell still held to the enemy; and Porter, not daring to retire, and having no intention whatever to advance, was still squat in his skulking place down behind Dawkin's Branch.

Now, take the hour of 4.30 p. m. This was a culminating point in the history of this man's disobedience. Pope, perplexed and thus far baffled, but undismayed, was resolutely struggling with the whole confederate army in his front. McDowell's corps was coming upon the field. King's division, under Hatch, was forming for a forward movement along the pike. Pope knew Porter had not connected with his left. He also knew that had he obeyed his orders to push forward on Gainesville it should have brought him upon the confederate flank or rear; and he had been waiting impatiently all day for Porter's guns to announce the welcome intelligence that he too had found and was grappling with the enemy. But he waited in vain. Off in Porter's direction all was silent as the grave. Pope had determined to make another assault upon the confederate line that night. He determined also to make another effort to get help from Porter, and at 4.30 p. m. sent him the following order:

"HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD,
August 29—4.30 p. m.

"MAJOR-GENERAL PORTER: Your line of march brings you in on the enemy's right flank. I desire you to push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and, if possible on the rear, keeping your right in communication with General Reynolds. The enemy is massed in the woods in front of us, but can be shelled out as soon as you engage their flank. Keep heavy reserves and use your batteries, keeping well closed to your right all the time. In case you are obliged to fall back, do so to your right and rear, so as to keep you in close communication with the right wing.

"JOHN POPE,
"Major-General, Commanding."

Now here is a peremptory order to "push forward into action at once." Did he obey it? There is no pretense whatever that he did. What was his excuse? He claims that he did not receive the order till sunset, and that it was then too late to attack.

Certain officers of his corps and staff cautiously fix the time "just before or about sunset." The sun set August 29 at 6.36, but daylight lingered for more than an hour afterward. Upon the authority of both Lee and Longstreet, the fight did not close until 9 o'clock. Hence we see by Porter's own version of the time he received the order he listened for two and one-half mortal hours to the struggle on his right, and made no move to help, though under a positive order "to push forward into action at once." But the truth is, Porter received this 4.30 order just about 5 o'clock—possibly a little later. Capt. Douglass Pope, who delivered the order, and two orderlies who accompanied him, all swear that they went straight down the Sudley Springs road, between 3 and 4 miles, and delivered this order not later than 5 o'clock. But there is a piece of evidence in the case that shows conclusively that Porter must have had this order a considerable time before 5.45 p. m. It is a message from General Warren to General Sykes that afternoon.

But before reading this message let it be understood that when Porter received the 4.30 order he evidently felt the necessity of making some show of obeying it—possibly for the moment not seeing how he could escape responsibility if he failed to do so. He accordingly sent the following order to General Morell who, remember, was at the head of the column.

[No. 37.]

AUGUST 29.

GENERAL MORELL: I wish you to push up two regiments supported by two others, preceded by skirmishers, the regiments at intervals of 200 yards, and attack the section of artillery opposed to you. The battle works well on our right, and the enemy are said to be retiring up the pike. Give the enemy a good shelling as our troops advance.

F. J. PORTER,
Major-General, Commanding.

This was the artillery which Sturgis said was "a mile away." But General Morell, speaking of this order in his testimony, says:

When I received that order—the latter part says, "the battle works well on our right; the enemy said to be retiring up the pike"—I said immediately to the person who brought it that the order was given under a misapprehension. We knew the enemy were not retiring, and I believe I sent that message to General Porter. I immediately gave orders to move the whole of my division to the front to be in readiness to support the four regiments. While that was going on I received a verbal order from Colonel Locke to make an attack. When I received this order it was quite late in the afternoon, just before sunset; the sun was almost touching the tops of the trees, and soon after that an order in writing, which is No. 38, "to put the men in position and remain during the night."

The following is No. 38:

GENERAL MORELL: Put your men in position to remain during the night, and have out your pickets. Put them so that they will be in a position to resist anything. I am about a mile from you. McDowell says all goes well, and we are getting the best of the fight. I wish you would send me a dozen men from the cavalry. Keep me informed. Troops are passing up to Gainesville, pushing the enemy. Ricketts has gone; also King.

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

Under this last order Morell suspended all proceedings looking toward an attack and put the men into position for the night. It seems that as a part of the preparation for an attack General Warren's brigade, of Sykes's division, was ordered to support General Morell, and at some time during the movements consequent upon these various orders Warren sent to Sykes the following statement of what he had done:

5.45 p. m., August 29, 1862.

GENERAL SYKES: I received an order from Mr. Cutting to advance to the support of Morell. I faced about and did so. I soon met Griffin's brigade withdrawing, by order of General Morell, who was not pushed out, but retiring. I faced about and marched back 200 yards or so; I met then an orderly from General Porter to General Morell, saying he must push on and press the enemy; that all was going well for us and he was retiring. Griffin then faced about, and I am following him to support General Morell, as ordered. None of the batteries are closed up to me.

Respectfully,

G. K. WARREN.

This note from Warren was manifestly written some time after Morell received Order 37, to attack. It was after Colonel Locke, of Porter's staff, delivered the verbal order to "push on and press the enemy." And presumably Colonel Locke did not start with the verbal order till Porter received the message which Morell says he sent him that the enemy were not retiring. And thus it would seem that three trips, of a mile each, were made between Porter and Morell after the receipt by Porter of the 4.30 order and before Warren wrote his note at 5.45, making it, as Douglass Pope and the two orderlies swore, about 5 o'clock when the order was delivered. And yet the advisory board, in the face of this incontrovertible proof, have the effrontery to say that "it was not received by Porter before 6.30 p. m."

After having thus strangely found this fact to suit Porter's purpose they then excuse him by saying it was too late to attack that night. But there was more than two hours of daylight after Warren's note was written, and more than three hours of fighting. Many a battle has been decided by the work of a very few minutes; but here is a man who makes no use of three hours; in fact, no use of the whole day. How unlike this was the conduct of another corps commander on another great occasion. On the day of the battle of Marengo Dessaix marched his troops 20 miles, and reaching the field just as the French on the left were falling back in confusion, he said to Napoleon: "I am in season to cover your retreat." Napoleon replied: "You are in season to win a victory." Dessaix instantly led his corps in an impetuous charge upon the enemy, in which he fell; but the pen of history now tells how Napoleon, with twenty thousand men, put to flight thirty-two thousand Austrians.

The French people, in grateful recognition of Dessaix's valor, have put his statue in the Place Dauphine, in Paris.

When a grateful Democracy shall have put the name of Fitz-John Porter on the retired-list of the Army it will then be in order to build his monument. It should bear this inscription: "To the memory of the general who was ordered to attack the enemy, but instead thereof hid his men in the bushes and indifferently listened to the noise of a great battle, in which 8,000 of his companions in arms were killed and wounded."

The board, not quite satisfied with this excuse for Porter, invent another. It is as follows:

It is a well-established military maxim that a corps commander is not justifiable in making an apparently hopeless attack in obedience to an order from a superior who is not on the spot, and who is evidently in error in respect to the essential conditions upon which the order is based. The duty of the corps commander in such a case is to make not a real attack, but a strong demonstration, so as to prevent the enemy in his front from sending reinforcements to other parts of his line.

It was Porter's duty, then, to "make a strong demonstration." Let us be thankful that in the opinion of this board it was Porter's duty to have done anything that day. But instead of "a strong demonstration," Porter's force was really so undemonstrative that Lee and Longstreet and Stuart understood it had wholly withdrawn. General Lee, in his report, says:

Soon after General Stuart reported the approach of a large force from the direction of Bristoe Station. The three brigades under Wilcox were sent to reinforce Jones, but no serious attack was made, and after firing a few shots the enemy withdrew.

Here recall the fact that Wilcox in his report says he went down "a mile or more." Then recall the passages already read from the reports of Stuart and Longstreet, which show that they, too, understood that Porter's force was withdrawn. Longstreet says:

After some few shots the enemy withdrew his forces. * * * Wilcox's brigades were moved back to their former position.

And Stuart says:

After exchanging a few shots with rifle pieces, this corps withdrew toward Manassas,

Thus do we see that Lee, Longstreet, and Stuart all supposed Porter had withdrawn; and this is the way he made "a strong demonstration." But the board, still attempting to excuse Porter, say:

The display of troops made by Porter earlier in the afternoon had all the desired and all possible beneficial effect. It caused Longstreet's reserve division to be sent to his extreme right in front of Porter's position. There that division remained until about 6 o'clock—too late for it to take any effective part in the operations at other points of the line.

This statement of the board is not only specious and misleading, but it is worse. It is untrue. This reserve division was under General Wilcox, who "went down a mile or more" towards Porter, and in his report says:

Now the command was ordered back to the turnpike, and forward on this to the support of General Hood, who became warmly engaged with the enemy.

General Lee says:

General Wilcox was recalled from the right and ordered to advance on Hood's left.

General Longstreet, in his report, says:

Hood's two brigades were pressed forward quickly to the attack. At the same time Wilcox's three brigades made a like advance.

Thus is it perfectly clear that instead of being "too late" this reserve division went forward in the advance that drove Pope's left back that night. Not only must this board stand convicted of these several misstatements of facts, but in their eagerness to completely vindicate Porter these gentlemen actually misstate the language of the 4.30 order. They say it was an order to attack Jackson's right flank. The order says:

Your line of march brings you on the enemy's right flank. Push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank.

But the board say "it required an attack which could not be made." Why not? Stuart says: "The prolongation of Porter's line of march would have struck Longstreet in flank." All he had to do was to "push forward" as Pope ordered and it would have brought him "into action on the enemy's flank." But he ordered Morell to put the men into position for the night. He did not even make a demonstration; not a shot was fired under the 4.30 order; not a gun opened its mouth in threatening; he did absolutely nothing, and Longstreet, unmolested, threw the bulk of his corps upon Reynolds's and King's divisions. But enough concerning the inacuracies of this board. I should not have taken so much time in exposing some of them, only for the fact that the opinion of this board has proved a stumbling-block with many fair-minded people who have not examined the whole case.

The report of this board has been accepted as an authoritative disposition of the subject. But the fact is, the board itself had no legal existence whatever. It was authorized neither by the law nor the Constitution. It was called into being and existed wholly outside the law. The only warrant for its existence was the will of the President. It was in every sense extra-judicial; and if it administered oaths, as it did, the persons administering them would, under the common law, and under the statutes of most of the States, my own certainly, be guilty of a misdemeanor and the persons taking those oaths could not be punished for perjury under them.

The President, if he wanted advice upon this subject with a view of exercising the pardoning power, might well enough have asked the opinion of these gentlemen, or the opinion of any other gentlemen. But that opinion when given was of no binding force upon any one, not even the President. It was simply advisory. Not so with the court-martial, however, which was a judicial tribunal, vested with the power of life and death, and whose judgment was final. Had the board confined itself to its legitimate and rightful work of advising the President as to the pardon of this man, no criticism could be offered. But instead of this, it altogether transcended the proper limit of its authority and advised that something be done that can not legally be done. And now, as a second false step, Congress is asked to act upon this illegitimate advice and transcend the proper limit of its authority by attempting to "annul and set aside" a judicial decree.

Let not, then, this unauthorized and illegal, and as we have abundantly seen, unreliable opinion of this board, longer mislead any one. It was undoubtedly from reading the artificial and fallacious report of this board and the testimony taken before it which, as we have already seen, was brought forth from the uncertain memory of sixteen years, rather than from carefully reading the reports of the confederate officers made at the time, that the friends of this bill are provided with their very best argument in support of it, namely, the opinion of the late General Grant. They tell us here was a man who led armies and fought battles and won victories. Surely his opinion ought to be decisive. But he would never have won victories with such support as Porter gave to Pope that day. With that kind of help he would never have won Donelson, or Shiloh, or Vicksburg, or Appomattox. It will not be claimed that General Grant was infallible. An examination of the letters written in this case by this sympathetic, confiding man will show that he lost himself in the vicious atmosphere of the report of this board and of the moldy recollections of the witnesses who came before it. The name of Ulysses S. Grant has gone into history. It will always hold a proud place in our country's annals, a secure place in the gratitude of the American people. But this will not be because of his letters in the Fitz-John Porter case, nor because of his relations with Ferdinand Ward in Wall street. It will be in spite of these things.

Now let us return to Fitz-John Porter and his command. Here was a corps in material and discipline considered the very best in the Army of the Potomac.

It contained the troops of the regular Army. It was filled with officers and men both patriotic and faithful.

Porter, told by Mr. McClellan that it was "a case of life and death," had brought this corps up from Falmouth in the last seven days, counting the 29th, a distance of 51 or 52 miles; a less distance than we have seen that A. P. Hill moved his division in two of those seven days.

This corps had seen no fighting since July 1; only two days less than two months since it had fired a gun at the enemy. We have already seen how the little Army of Virginia since the battle of Cedar Mountain, August 9, had been constantly marching and fighting, all the time being confronted by greatly superior numbers. And again on this memorable 29th of August the remnant of that army was found in line of battle and in deadly encounter with the enemy. But this corps of Porter's instead of being in line of battle and facing the enemy was strung along the road from Bethlehem church to Dawkin's Branch, just as the column halted, the men taking their ease, and its commander apparently not at all stirred by the din of battle on his right, in which his companions in arms were falling like autumn leaves. With three several orders in his pocket, obedience to any one of which would have taken him to the assistance of the line under Pope, which he understood was being driven back, he decided without striking a single blow to "withdraw to Manassas." But not quite daring to do this unless McDowell would join him he reluctantly remained, but was careful to give no assistance through the long hours of that fierce contest which only the thick darkness of 9 o'clock at night could subdue. Yes, ordered to advance, he "determined to withdraw to Manassas," and actually sent one brigade back, apparently not caring what disaster might overtake the army on the right; not caring that the capital was in danger; that, in fact, the hand of the assassin was at the very throat of the State.

Now, this was Fitz-John Porter's conduct on the 29th of August, 1862. But this was not the only day of his disobedience. We have seen how, upon the receipt of the very first order from the commander of the Army of Virginia, he was in doubt whether he would obey it; and upon deciding to do so, asked his friend Burnside to "inform McClellan that he might know he was doing right." We have seen also how the order of the 27th to move at 1 o'clock a. m. was wholly disregarded. And, most significant of all, as the mirror in which stands reflected the treacherous purpose of this man, we have seen his oft-repeated expressions of contempt for Pope and the mysterious turning of his heart to another idol—to the man who said, "See me before you sail." The board says this conduct of Porter was "obedient, subordinate, and faithful." But I tell you, notwithstanding this encomium of the board; notwithstanding under this bill, if it should become a law, the President and Senate may restore him to his original rank in the Army and put him on the retired-list, the impartial pen of history will write against the name of Fitz-John Porter the word traitor—not to the flag, but to his superior officer, whom he was resolved not to help win any victories in that campaign.

But the darkness of night had come on and the battle was fast dying out. General Pope had heard no sound from Porter's guns in response to the 4.30 order; and he knew that Porter must have wholly disregarded it, just as he had every order he had thus far sent him, excepting the first. Saying to himself "I will see if I can get this man into action," Pope sent him the following, which by its terms is suggestive that he was becoming somewhat in earnest:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
IN THE FIELD NEAR BULL RUN,
August 29, 1862—8.50 p. m.

GENERAL: Immediately upon receipt of this order, the precise hour of receiving which you will acknowledge, you will march your command to the field of battle of to-day and report to me in person for orders. You are to understand that you are expected to comply strictly with this order, and to be present on the field within three hours after its reception, or after daybreak to-morrow morning.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

Maj. Gen. F. J. PORTER.

[Received August 30—3.30 a. m.]

But Porter did not obey this last order. Though he went himself, he did not take his whole command to the field. Two brigades and one of his division commanders, General Morell, straggled away to Centreville, more than 6 miles to the rear. One of these brigades reached the field at night, just as the battle closed; but the other made no effort whatever to come up. Pope's force was less on the 30th by these two brigades, about four thousand men, than it would have been had Porter taken them along as ordered. Think of it, two whole brigades ordered up to take part in the battle, marching back 6 miles to the rear! Now, if Porter did not connive at this, he was clearly responsible for it. The officers of these brigades only did what they knew Porter all the time wanted to do, namely, fall back, one of them testifying that he expected when he reached Centreville to have found Porter there.

But Porter was on the field on the 30th and took part in the battle. It is said that he did well. But suppose he did; that does not help his former conduct. He was then under the very eye of his superior, and if he faltered his disobedience would be plain.

Notwithstanding the gallant fighting of the 30th the battle was lost. It was fatally turned against us by the complete inactivity of Porter's corps on the 29th, before the enemy was settled in his position and before his re-enforcements were all up.

Porter's failure to take four thousand of his twelve thousand men into action on the 30th, coupled with the fact that Lee was re-enforced on the morning of the 30th with Maj. Gen. R. H. Anderson's division of six thousand men, and Col. S. D. Lee's battalion of artillery (volume 12, part 2, page 577; and part 3, page 935), made Lee relatively stronger by ten thousand men, not counting Colonel Lee's artillery, than he was on the 29th; and this saying nothing of Lee's further re-enforcement on the afternoon of the 30th by McLaws's and D. H. Hills's divisions of five thousand men each, and nothing also of Franklin's corps from the Army of the Potomac, which should have participated in both days' fight, lost us the second battle of Bull Run. The 29th was the day of our hope in that battle. That was the day when the heavy blows should have been struck, but on that day Fitz-John Porter, though four times ordered to strike, never lifted a hand.

The second battle of Bull Run ought to have been a great Union victory. It would have been had Porter been zealous and active on the 29th; and had General Franklin gone forward with alacrity under the orders he received it must have resulted in the overwhelming defeat of the enemy. It would have been the Waterloo of the rebellion. There would have been no Antietam, no Gettysburg, and no river of blood from the Wilderness to Cold Harbor.

Now, to properly understand the conduct of Fitz-John Porter in this campaign it should be studied in the light of the conduct of General Franklin and the commander of the Army of the Potomac. By taking a view of these three men in a group the motive for Porter's lukewarmness becomes apparent. Without this his conduct, though clearly disobedient, might seem inexplicable; with it all is plain. Now, remember that on the 3d of August General McClellan was ordered to withdraw the Army of the Potomac from the James for the reinforcement of the army under General Pope. When these armies were united who was to have command, Pope or McClellan? That was the question. For some reason never explained General Sumner's corps was held back till all the other corps had come forward. Now, of all the corps commanders of the Army of the Potomac at that time, if there was one who, like Napoleon's marshals "always marched to the sound of the enemy's guns," it was Edwin V. Sumner. But he was kept back. We have already seen how not a man left Harrison's Landing under this order till August 14; we have also seen Porter's arrival at Falmouth the 22d and his snail-like progress in connecting with Pope and his conduct thereafter. Now, General Franklin's corps arrived at Alexandria the 24th and 25th of August. On the 26th he received the following order (volume 12, part 3, page 676):

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, August 26, 1862.

Major-General FRANKLIN, Alexandria, Va.:

You will march your corps by Centreville toward Warrenton, reporting to General Pope in the absence of General McClellan from the immediate field of operations.

H. W. HALLECK, General-in-Chief.

On the 27th, General McClellan arrived at Alexandria and reported to the General-in-Chief. On the 28th the following dispatch was sent to General Franklin (part 3, page 707):

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, August 28, 1862.

Major-General FRANKLIN, Alexandria, Va.:

On parting with General McClellan about 2 o'clock this morning it was understood that you were to move your corps to-day toward Manassas Junction to drive the enemy from the railroad. I have just learned that the general has not yet returned to Alexandria. If you have not received his orders act on this.

H. W. HALLECK, General-in-Chief.

But it seems the General-in-Chief learned that Franklin had not gone forward as ordered, and McClellan was claiming he was not ready to go, whereupon Halleck sent the following to General McClellan (part 3, page 710):

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 28, 1862—7.40 p. m.

Major-General McCLELLAN, Alexandria, Va.:

There must be no further delay in moving Franklin's corps toward Manassas. They must go to-morrow morning, ready or not ready. If we delay too long to get ready there will be no necessity to go at all, for Pope will either be defeated or victorious without our aid. If there is want of wagons the men must carry provisions with them until the wagons can come to their relief.

H. W. HALLECK, General-in-Chief.

The following order (part 3, page 723) speaks for itself:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 29, 1862—7.40 p. m.

Major-General McCLELLAN, Alexandria, Va.:

You will immediately send construction trains and guards to repair railroad to Manassas; let there be no delay in this.

I have just been told that Franklin's corps stopped at Annandale, and that he was this evening in Alexandria.

This is all contrary to my orders; investigate and report the facts of this disobedience. That corps must push forward as I directed, protect the railroad, and open our communication with Manassas.

H. W. HALLECK, General-in-Chief.

On the night of the 30th, after the battle was all over, this corps reached Centreville, a distance of 20 miles from Alexandria, where it landed five days before. Thus do we see that Franklin went to the relief of Pope much as Porter did. Now, without claiming that McClellan ought to have got Porter's corps to Falmouth in less than twenty days after he was ordered, and Franklin's corps to Alexandria in less than twenty-three days, can there be any doubt but that if these two corps, after they were landed, had pressed forward with vigor to the help of Pope there would have been a radically different result on the plains of Manassas? It would have resulted in a signal victory, in a complete triumph for the Army of Virginia and its commander, and as the hero of the hour Pope would have had command of the Army of the Potomac. But instead of this the day was lost. Pope was whipped. He was no longer to be feared by McClellan or his friends. No one knew this better than McClellan himself. Porter had been the chief instrument of Pope's defeat, and rumors of his infidelity had come up here to the capital. Whereupon McClellan, two days after the battle, two days after the mischief was all done, in the exercise of that mystical power which he was supposed to hold over this man, sent him the following fervid personal note:

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 1, 1862—5.30 p. m.

I ask you for my sake, that of the country, and of the old Army of the Potomac, that you and all friends will lend the fullest and most cordial co-operation to General Pope in all the operations now going on.

The distresses of our country, the honor of our arms are at stake, and all depends now upon the cheerful co-operation of all in the field. This week is the crisis of our fate. Say the same thing to all my friends in the Army of the Potomac, and that the last request I have to make of them is that for their country's sake they will extend to General Pope the same support they ever have to me. I am in charge of the defenses of Washington. I am doing all I can to render your retreat safe, should that become necessary.

GEORGE B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General.

Major-General PORTER,
Centreville, Commanding Fifth Corps.

Now to understand the exact meaning of this patriotic appeal there should be read right between the lines of it the following dispatch of just three days before, sent in reply to Pope's call for food for his army; and sent, too, at the very hour he was engaged in deadly conflict with the enemy, and while Alexandria was swarming with troops from the Army of the Potomac, among which was Franklin's Corps, which, as we have seen, was ordered two days before that to march to the relief of Pope. Would that this dispatch had never been sent. Here it is. (Supplement to report of Committee on Conduct of War, part 2, page 156):

AUGUST 29, 1862—8 p. m

To COMMANDING OFFICER at Centreville:

I have been instructed by General McClellan to inform you that he will have all the available wagons at Alexandria loaded with rations for your troops, and all of the cars also, as soon as you will send a cavalry escort to Alexandria as a guard to the train.

Respectfully,

W. B. FRANKLIN,
Maj. Gen., Commanding Sixth Corps.

This last dispatch shows the kind of support McClellan would have had Porter give to Pope had the request been before the battle. But the mischief was already done. Pope's fate was fixed. He was beaten, and was sure to be set aside. The man to lead armies is never the man who loses battles. On the 1st day of September the Army of Virginia was ordered within the fortifications about Washington, and McClellan set about consolidating it with the Army of the Potomac; and Pope was without a command. His sun had set. And at the same time "McClellan's star was up"—just as Fitz-John Porter wrote his friend Burnside he hoped it would be "about the 31st." It was only one day behind the time fixed by Porter's horoscope when Burnside was to hear from him "by way of Alexandria;" and like a true prophet he had done as little as possible to prevent the fulfillment of the prophecy. The result was not only as Porter hoped, but as McClellan expected when he wrote Burnside a "confidential" note on the 20th of August, saying:

Yesterday and to-day I have received intelligence from confidential sources leading me to think it probable that Halleck will not or can not carry out his intention in regard to my position as expressed to you. (Volume 12, part 2, page 605.)

No, he "could not." The crisis was not then passed. The victorious enemy was still aggressive. Though McClellan was under manifest suspicion at the War Department of not having brought the Army of the Potomac to Pope's assistance as expeditiously as he might (volume 12, part 3, page 706), yet it "could not" in that critical and perilous time displace him and give the command to another; and as the result the army under his leadership followed the enemy into Maryland.

The stake that Porter had played for was won. He was again with the chief whom he loved best. Nor was McClellan ungrateful to his friend.

The curious will always wonder whether it was from a sense of obligation or from purely military considerations that at the terrible battle of Antietam, on the 17th of September, Porter was given the post of honor and the place of safety.

His corps was held all day in reserve behind the hill just in front of Pry's house, where McClellan had his headquarters, and during the whole of that bloody struggle never fired a gun. Thus for a season did the guilty prosper. But a day of reckoning was at hand. When the tide of war set back again to the southward this man was brought to justice.

Nine general officers, among them James A. Garfield, presided over by the venerable David Hunter, just gone to his reward, said he was guilty of disobedience of orders and sentenced him to be dismissed from the service. The findings and sentence were approved by Abraham Lincoln; and this man left the Army covered with the disgrace which he had brought upon himself. But now, after twenty-three years, it is proposed by the unauthorized and violent edict of Congress to "annul and set aside" the judgment of that court. It may be natural for those of you on the other side of the House, who were on the other side on the 29th of August, 1862, to feel like helping this man now, who so effectually helped you then. But remember that this Government is now yours; and just now the administration of it is yours. And, through your President, the command of the Army is yours. And, as swift punishment would have surely overtaken conduct like that of Porter in the army to which you then belonged, how can you consistently or safely make the attack contemplated by this bill upon the efficiency and good name of the Army whose honor is now in your keeping?

Ask yourselves upon the other side of the House, before passing this bill, if you can afford to prostitute the legislative power of this Government to the work of overthrowing the judgment of any court whatever which has existence by authority of law.

Ask yourselves if you can afford to break down the discipline of your Army by restoring to rank and position therein a man of whose treachery and disobedience nine-tenths of that Army are well convinced. But it may be said that this was an occurrence of the war and should be treated in the spirit of that general amnesty which is fast blotting out the transgressions of that period.

Now, with the principle laid down by Montesquieu in his Spirit of Laws, that—

It is not profitable for republics to deal harshly with those who may rebel against its authority; that it is more advisable to exceed in lenity than severity; to banish but few rather than many; and to leave them their estates instead of making a vast number of confiscations; that the object is not to destroy the rebel, but the rebellion—

all will agree. And it is to the lasting credit of this American Republic that, when the surrender came, blood ceased to flow. Not a political execution followed. But this principle of Montesquieu does not apply to the case before us. For the man who, in the face of the world, stands up in battle for his flag there may be room for respect, even though it be the flag of rebellion. But what shall be said of the man who stood coolly by and gave the enemy a victory rather than help his superior officer whom he did not like? What shall be said of the man whom the slaughter of his friends did not move?

Were this gray-haired old man, who some think has been sufficiently punished already, to confess his error and ask to be relieved from a punishment greater than he could bear, the appeal might arouse compassion, even though this body were powerless, as it is, to relieve. But that is not the attitude of Fitz-John Porter. He comes justifying, not confessing. He demands restoration to his place in the Army from which he claims to have been wrongfully thrust out by the unjust judgment of a court-martial. He does not ask mercy. He demands justice. But justice cries out against him. The law cries out against him. The Army and Navy, both officers and men, cry out against him. The millions who upheld the flag in the late civil struggle cry out against him. Three hundred thousand veteran soldiers who fought for the preservation of the Union cry out against him. The disembodied spirits of those who fell on the 29th of August, 1862, cry out against him; as

They wheel in airy echelon
From pass and height and plain,
To form upon that bloody ground
Their scattered ranks again, they cry out against him.

The martyred Lincoln and the martyred Garfield, both of whom sat in judgment upon this man, and one of whom said, "the case would have justified the sentence of death," cry out from the silent chambers of the dead against him.

In the name of good government and for the sake of legislative decency let us hope that the law may not be outraged and justice mocked by the passage of this bill, against which stands the solemn protest of both the living and the dead.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like for a moment to call attention to a statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG]. That gentleman read from the report of Major-General Heintzelman for the purpose, as I understand, of showing that Kearny, on the afternoon of the 29th, was ordered to attack and failed to do so until after 6 o'clock. The gentleman stated—and it was true, of course—that General Kearny made no report after his death. But he did prepare a report on the 31st of August, covering the operations of his division on the 29th and 30th—a report which was intended to be signed by him on the day of his death, and which was forwarded by his successor, General Birney, in this language:

Respectfully forwarded as the official report drawn up by the late Maj. Gen. Philip Kearny, and intended to have been signed by him the day of his death.

The report may be found on page 415, volume 12, part 2, of the Records of the War of the Rebellion. In this report General Kearny gives his own account of the matter referred to in the report of General Heintzelman. I read the language of General Kearny:

Toward noon I was obliged to occupy a quarter of a mile additional on left of said road, from Schurz's troops being taken elsewhere.

During the first hours of combat General Birney, on tired regiments in the center falling back, of his own accord rapidly pushed across to give them a hand to raise themselves to a renewed fight. In early afternoon General Pope's order, per General Roberts, was to send a pretty strong force diagonally to the front to relieve the center in the woods from pressure. Accordingly I detached for that purpose General Robinson with his brigade; the Sixty-third Pennsylvania Volunteers, Colonel Hays; the One hundred and fifth Pennsylvania Volunteers, Captain Craig; the Twentieth Indiana, Colonel Brown; and, additionally, the Third Michigan Marksmen, under Colonel Champlin. General Robinson drove forward for several hundred yards; but the center of the main battle being shortly after driven back and out of the woods, my detachment, thus exposed so considerably in front of all others, both flanks in air, was obliged to cease to advance and confine themselves to holding their own.

At 5 o'clock, thinking—though at the risk of exposing my fighting line to being enfiladed—that I might drive the enemy by an unexpected attack through the woods, I brought up additionally the most of Birney's regiments—the Fourth Maine, Colonel Walker and Lieutenant-Colonel Carver; the Fortieth New York, Colonel Egan; First New York, Major Burt, and One hundred and first New York, Lieutenant-Colonel Gesner—and changed front to the left to sweep with a rush the first line of the enemy. This was most successful. The enemy rolled up on his own right. It presaged a victory for us all. Still our force was too light. The enemy brought up rapidly heavy reserves, so that our further progress was impeded.

Now, I desire merely to call attention to this in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG], who sought to create the impression that at that critical moment General Kearny failed to respond. I have read General Kearny's own answer to the statement of General Heintzelman, which must have been made under a misapprehension of the facts.

Mr. BRAGG. It is a fact, however, is it not, that Grover was not supported? Can there be any dispute that General Grover was not supported?

Mr. THOMPSON. I have simply called attention to General Kearny's statement, which is a full answer to the statement made by General Heintzelman in his report.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, in making my remarks to-day, being confined to an hour, and as the speech which I had prepared would have exceeded an hour in length, there were necessarily some parts which I could not read in full, simply stating their substance. I now ask permission to print in full in the RECORD my speech as prepared.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the leave requested will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. EDEN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. BRAGG (at 10 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be erected in Washington a monument, with appropriate statuary, to commemorate the illustrious public services of the late Ulysses S. Grant.

SEC. 2. A commission, to consist of three Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, are authorized to contract for said monument.

SEC. 3. The sum of $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for this purpose.

Mr. LOGAN. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he increase the amount by $100,000. I do not think $150,000 would erect a monument to General Grant that the country would be satisfied with.

Mr. HOAR. With the unanimous consent of the Senate I will amend the bill accordingly at this moment, and make the amount proposed to be appropriated for the purpose $250,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has a right to modify it at the present stage. The bill as amended will be referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. CULLOM. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That 500 additional copies of Senate bill No. 1532 be printed for the use of the Senate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

REPORT ON SHIPPING INTERESTS OF GERMANY.

Mr. FRYE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he hereby is, requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of a report recently received by him from Frederick Raine, consul-general of the United States at Berlin, upon the shipping interests of Germany.

PEARSON C. MONTGOMERY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the Calendar is in order under the eighth rule. The first case will be stated.

The bill (S. 18) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn., was announced as first in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 6, after the words "sum of," to strike out "fourteen" and insert "three;" and in line 7, before the word "hundred," to strike out "eight" and insert "one;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, State of Tennessee, the sum of $3,100, in full compensation for property taken from him for the use of and used by the Army of the United States during the late war.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report, submitted by Mr. PIKE January 13, 1886, but before concluding—

Mr. CONGER. That involves some questions which ought to be considered in a longer time than under the five-minute rule, and for that reason I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

Mr. PIKE subsequently said: I wish to call attention to Order of Business 52, being the bill (S. 18) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn., which was objected to by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] when reached. I have consulted him, and he is willing to allow it to remain on the Calendar as it is without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

AMERICAN REGISTER FOR STEAMSHIP CAROLINE MILLER.

The bill (S. 491) to provide for an American register for the steamship Caroline Miller, of Baltimore, Md., was announced as next in order; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having heretofore been read, the question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Committee on Commerce report to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to authorize and direct the inspection of said steam-vessel, steam-boiler, steam-pipes, and the appurtenances of said boiler, and cause to be granted the proper and usual certificate issued to steam-vessels of the merchant marine, without reference to the fact that said steam-boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances were not constructed pursuant to the laws of the United States, and were not constructed of iron stamped pursuant to said laws; and the tests to be applied on the inspection of said boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances will be the same, in all respects as to strength and safety, as are required in the inspection of boilers constructed in the United States for marine purposes, save that the fact that said boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances not being constructed pursuant to the requirements of the laws of the United States, and are of unstamped iron, shall not be an obstacle to the granting of the usual certificate if said boiler, steam-pipes, and appurtenances are found to be of sufficient strength and safety.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. That bill was passed over the other day because it was not accompanied by a report. Has a report since been filed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not able to inform the Senator. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], the Chair thinks, filed a report.

Mr. GORMAN. I submitted a report in accordance with the understanding, but I find that the report has not yet come from the Public Printer. I hold in my hand, however, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject.

Mr. FRYE. The report has been submitted, I understand the Senator to say?

Mr. GORMAN. It has been submitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in the hands of the Printer.

Mr. FRYE. That is all I desire. A report stating the facts should be submitted, because it is an exceptional case; and in all such cases of application to be removed from the general rule I think a report should accompany the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN HOLROYD.

The bill (S. 94) for the relief of Mrs. Sarah Elizabeth Holroyd, widow and administratrix of the estate of John Holroyd, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Mrs. Sarah Elizabeth Holroyd, widow and administratrix of the estate of John Holroyd, deceased, $1,000, in full consideration for the entire past and future use by the Government of the United States of the patented hook and eye for tackle-blocks of John Holroyd, if a full, sufficient, and legal transfer and license is executed and deposited with the Navy Department, for the Government purposes, free of all charges of royalty.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JABEZ BURCHARD.

The bill (S. 570) for the relief of Jabez Burchard was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. PLUMB. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. PLUMB. I call for the reading of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report, submitted by Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, January 20, 1886, and before concluding,

Mr. PLUMB. I think I shall have to object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule.

LIEUT. WILLIAM P. RANDALL.

The bill (S. 367) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the next case on the Calendar will be announced.

JAMES CLIFFORD.

The bill (S. 738) for the relief of James Clifford was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay $556.70 to James Clifford, of Fort Smith, Ark., for iron doors and windows furnished for the United States jail at Fort Smith, in the western district of Arkansas, during the year 1874, under employment by the jailor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPT. C. H. WARRENS.

The bill (S. 1052) for the relief of Capt. C. H. Warrens was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Capt. C. H. Warrens, of the Fourteenth Infantry, United States Army, $621.18, to reimburse him for a like amount stolen from him, in quartermaster supplies, by Sergeant Bismarck, who is now serving a term of imprisonment for his crime.

Mr. PLUMB. Is there a report with that bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report; it will be read.

Mr. PLUMB. It seems to me it should require some unusual statement of fact to warrant the passage of a bill of that kind, and I should like to hear the facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. LOGAN, January 20, 1886:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1052) for the relief of Capt. C. H. Warrens, have duly considered the same, and submit the following report:

It appears from the evidence submitted that Captain Warrens was, in 1867, post quartermaster at Fort Douglas, Utah, and depot quartermaster at Ogden, Utah, 38 miles distant, where his duties required his frequent presence. He was post commissary and purchasing commissary at Salt Lake City. It will be seen that he was often necessarily absent from Fort Douglas.

During these absences Sergt. Robert Bismarck, who was quartermaster-sergeant, had many opportunities to steal quartermaster's property, and did so. A part of these stolen stores were traced and found, but some of them were never recovered, and it is for these that Captain Warrens has been held accountable.

A court-martial was convened, and Sergeant Bismarck was found guilty of stealing these stores and sentenced to seven years in the penitentiary. The board of survey entirely exonerated Captain Warrens from all blame.

There is abundant evidence that Captain Warrens was in no way responsible for the loss of these stores.

The total deficiency, as ascertained by the board of inquiry, amounted to $1,788.24. Of this amount $1,090.55 was ascertained to have been stolen by Sergeant Bismarck. The sum of $76.51 has also been passed to the credit of Captain Warrens, which leaves a balance of $621.18, the amount appropriated by this bill, against his pay, which amount represents the value of the goods stolen but could not be found.

Your committee are of the opinion that the bill ought to pass, wherefore they report S. 1052 without amendment, and recommend that it do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF J. J. PULLIAM.

The bill (S. 605) for the relief of the estate of J. J. Pulliam, deceased, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator withhold his objection one moment to allow me to state to him what the bill is? It is a very compact matter, and it will take but half a minute to state the facts.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the objection for the moment.

Mr. HOAR. When the bill containing some thirteen hundred or fourteen hundred items which passes every year for quartermaster stores came to the Senate last year, after passing the House of Representatives (the bill is made up in the Quartermaster's Department and comes from the Treasury, I think, here, and the committee always have an examination and a comparison of the evidence with the amounts in the bill), the attention of the committee was called by the Department to that fact that a clerical mistake had been made in the case of this man, and that instead of being entitled to thirteen hundred and odd dollars which was allowed him, he was entitled to two or three thousand dollars more; I have forgotten the exact amount. To have made the amendment in the Senate would have required the sending back of that bill to the other House for concurrence in the amendment, and involved perhaps the loss of the whole bill, covering some thirteen hundred claimants. Thereupon the committee in its report that year stated that this mistake had been discovered, and that it was satisfied the man ought to have a larger sum, but thought it would be unjust to the other claimants to send the bill back and risk its entire loss at that stage of the session. This bill is to correct that mistake by authorizing the accounting officers of the Treasury to examine and settle the account. That is the whole story.

Mr. PLUMB. That ought to be stated in the bill.

Mr. HOAR. It is stated in the report.

Mr. PLUMB. The bill itself ought to state that it is one of that class of cases, because if gone on in the ordinary way according to the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts that would not have been a part of the bill itself and therefore it would have remained upon the statute-book as a naked appropriation for taking wood from the estate during the war. I think the bill ought to be amended in such a way as to disclose that fact. I wish to say further that I think there has been a great deal of looseness about the payment of this class of claims, and I should be very glad to know that the last of them was disposed of. The general talk among people who know about the situation of these bills is that most of this class of claimants were disloyal during the war, but in some way we seem to allow everybody's claim who presents it and the proof of loyalty is always forthcoming. I think that hereafter we ought to stop such allowances, or at all events we ought to have the facts clearly stated in the bill itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PLUMB. I object.

Mr. HOAR. I move to take up the bill. It is a five-minutes matter, and it is a clear case of justice.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will amend the bill——

Mr. HOAR. I shall move the amendment the Senator suggests.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will prepare such an amendment it would be the better way to identify it as being part of the measure.

Mr. HOAR. Let the bill stand over until to-morrow morning, and in the mean time I shall present the amendment to the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be pursued if there be no objection. The next case on the Calendar will be called.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like the Senate to proceed now to the consideration of the education bill, which, I hope, by taking up this morning we may be able to get through with during the day. I ask the friends of the measure to stand by it until we do conclude it, if possible, to-night. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the education bill, which is the unfinished business.

Mr. PLUMB. I think we had better have the Calendar a little while.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools. The question is on that motion.

The motion was not agreed to.

SONE AND FLEMING MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 601) for the relief of the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, Limited, of the city of New York, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, Limited, of the city of New York, of $5,265.73, being the amount of drawback of duties due to them on certain tin cans exported by them, but which were not entered for drawback within the time fixed by law.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to hear the report read.

Mr. HOAR. I will state the point, and if the Senator shall want the report read afterward, very well.

Mr. PLATT. It will do just as well to have the point stated.

Mr. HOAR. The report was made originally by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] when a member of the Committee on Claims in a former Congress.

This company were entitled to a drawback on certain oil, of which they were refiners and exporters. They sent their clerk to the custom-house in New York with the money for the payment of the drawback, and the clerk stole it and ran away with it. The statute says that:

SEC. 3037. Whenever the exporter entering any merchandise, for the benefit of drawback, shall not have completed such entry, by taking the oath or giving the bond required by the existing laws, within the period prescribed by law, but shall offer to complete the entry after the expiration of the period, the Secretary of the Treasury may, upon application to him made, by the exporter, setting forth the cause of his omission, under oath, and accompanied by a statement of the collector of all the circumstances attending the transaction within the knowledge of such collector, if he shall be satisfied that the failure to complete the entry was accidental, without any intention to evade the law or defraud the revenue, direct the entry to be completed, and the certificates or debentures, as the case may be, to issue in the same manner, as if such entry had been completed within the period prescribed by the existing laws of the United States.

In this case the company had not begun the entry because the clerk who went down with the fees should have made the original entry, but we were satisfied that the case came within the spirit and purpose of that section. Mr. Arthur, who was then the collector of New York, certified to the high character of the firm and recommended the repayment of the drawback. As soon as the firm discovered the default of their clerk they instantly paid their fees and made their application within a few weeks or months after the transaction.

Mr. MORRILL. This is a case that peculiarly belongs to the Committee on Finance. I do not know how it came to be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know how that was, but it had been referred to the Committee on Claims by a former Congress. It has been here some years.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he would have any objection to having it referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOAR. Not the slightest in the world, if you will take charge of it.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

MAURICE GRIVOT.

The bill (S. 177) for the relief of the heirs of Maurice Grivot was announced as next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, being objected to, goes over under the rules.

SUFFERERS BY WRECK OF UNITED STATES STEAMER TALLAPOOSA.

The bill (S. 702) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Tallapoosa was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under the rules.

TRESPASSERS ON INDIAN LANDS.

The bill (S. 1055) to amend section 2148 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in relation to trespassers on Indian lands was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, in line 11, before the words "be imprisoned," to strike out "and" and insert "or;" and in line 16, before the words "be imprisoned," to strike out "and" and insert "or."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. INGALLS. This bill was reported from a committee of which I am a member and generally received my concurrence; but I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the clause between lines 17 and 22, and ask him whether or not it is advisable to retain a provision as vague and as unusual as that is:

And the wagons, teams, and outfit of such person or persons so offending shall be seized and delivered to the proper United States officer, and be proceeded against by libel in the proper court, and forfeited, one-half to the informer and the other half to the United States.

There is absolutely no limitation. A man may not have taken his teams in there at all; they may be elsewhere employed; but if he goes on an Indian reservation, whether he takes his team and wagon and outfit or not, then his personal property that comes within that description is to be libeled and proceeded against for forfeiture, and one-half to be given to the informer and the other half to the United States. It appears to me that those provisions are inconsistent with the proper administration of the criminal law. In the first place, there may not be any informer to give one-half of it to; and I should say it was unusually and inordinately severe, after putting a man in prison and subjecting him to a fine to deprive him of his personal property. I suggest to the Senator whether it would not be well to leave out that clause. The man may have a family that need these things.

Mr. DAWES. I have no special objection to the striking out of that clause in the bill. It may not be improper, if it is not unparliamentary, to say that the bill was prepared at the Interior Department, and is a bill which has passed the Senate two or three times at previous sessions. It is intended to meet the case of the "boomers," as they are called, going into the Indian Territory for the purpose of taking possession of that land and holding it. Under the existing law trespassers upon the Indian lands can only be fined, and the leaders of those bands have heretofore been arrested after they had been warned and after all proper and reasonable means had been taken to induce them to desist, and the Army of the United States has been employed necessarily to protect that land from their invasion. They have been prosecuted under existing law, have been taken to court, and have been fined $1,000 under existing law, and have the next day taken the poor debtor's oath and gone back and repeated this offense over and over again; and they exult in the fact that they are independent of the Government. They would just as lief be fined as not. They have nothing with which to pay the fine. It is to meet that that the Interior Department under various administrations has asked this legislation, and it has passed the Senate from time to time in precisely this form.

The provision to which the Senator from Kansas alludes is analogous to the one in section 2140 of the Revised Statutes, where people who take liquor onto Indian reservations are subject to a penalty and their teams and wagons are forfeited. There is some force in the suggestion of the Senator that it should be confined only to the teams that are used for the purpose of furthering this particular object. I am inclined to think with the Senator that the penalty provided in this bill will be sufficiently severe; and certainly the bill could be amended so that it should be confined to those particular teams used in taking possession. If the Senator will suggest such an amendment as that I shall be glad. If the Senator thinks, however, that it is severe enough to prevent the repetition of the scenes, which I know he does not approve any more than any other member of the committee, I shall not object.

The bill comes to us in the form and from the source I have suggested, and is deemed by the administrators of the law necessary in order to prevent this willful defiance of existing laws in taking possession of territory which the laws of the land make it clear the trespassers have no right to.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to strike out, between the word "year," in line 17 and the word "and" at the close of line 21, what will be read by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

And the wagons, teams, and outfit of such person or persons so offending shall be seized and delivered to the proper United States officer, and be proceeded against by libel in the proper court, and forfeited, one-half to the informer and the other half to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 1200) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864, and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act; and to provide for a settlement of claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain of said railroads, and to secure to the United States the payment of all indebtedness of certain of the companies therein mentioned.

Mr. INGALLS. That can not be considered this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under the rules.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON.

The bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes, was announced next in order.

Mr. INGALLS. Nor that.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to say a word.

Mr. INGALLS. I withdraw any objection.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to say a word in regard to this bill. As the Senator from Kansas suggests, it is impossible to consider the bill under this rule; but I gave notice the other day that I should call it up immediately after the disposition of the educational bill which is now under consideration; and while I have no objection to its passing into the Calendar under the ninth rule, I wish the Senate to understand that I shall as soon as I can call it up for action.

Mr. HOAR. I had already given notice to the Senate sometime ago that at the close of the debate on the educational bill I should ask the Senate to take up and consider the bankruptcy bill. It is one which has been already passed by this body. But I do not wish to come in conflict with the bill in regard to the admission of Washington. Therefore I will waive whatever possible title I might have to ask the Senate to take up that bill at the close of the educational bill, and will give notice that at the close of the bill mentioned by the Senator from Connecticut I shall ask to take up the bankruptcy bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under the objection.

BODIES FOR DISSECTION.

The bill (S. 349) for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent the desecration of graves was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 14 of section 1, after the word "within," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "forty-eight;" and in line 16, after the words "he is," to strike out "of kindred to" and insert "a relation by blood or marriage, or friend, of;" so as to make the section read:

That any public officer or officers, whether directors, trustees, superintendents, wardens, keepers, or managers, having lawful charge of or control over any hospital, prison, almshouse, jail, morgue, or asylum within the District of Columbia, may deliver to the duly authorized agent of any medical college or colleges in the said District of Columbia the bodies of such deceased persons as are required to be buried at the public expense, said bodies to be distributed among the several colleges equitably, the number assigned to each being proportioned to that of its students: Provided, however, That if the deceased person, during his last illness, of his own accord requested to be buried; or if, within forty-eight hours after his death, any person claiming to be and satisfying the authorities that he is, a relative by blood or marriage, or friend, of the deceased asks to have the body buried; or if such deceased person was a stranger or traveler who suddenly died, the body shall not be so delivered, but shall be buried.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 14, after the word "not," to strike out "exceeding" and insert "less than two nor more than;" so as to make the section read:

That every physician or surgeon, before receiving such dead body, shall give to the officers surrendering the same to him a sufficient bond that each body shall be used only for the promotion of anatomical and surgical knowledge within the District of Columbia, and that after having been so used the remains thereof shall be decently buried; and whosoever shall use such body or bodies for any purpose other than that aforesaid, or shall remove the same beyond the limits of the said District of Columbia, and whoever shall sell or buy such body or bodies, or in any way traffic in the same, or who shall disturb or remove bodies from graves in which they have been buried, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction, be imprisoned for a term not less than two nor more than three years, at hard labor, in the District (or city) jail.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. If the report is not long I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no printed report, the Chair is advised.

Mr. INGALLS. I think there is.

Mr. PLATT. The Calendar seems to show that there is a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. VANCE, February 4, 1886:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred bill S. 349, having considered the same, report as follows:

The object of this bill is to provide sufficient dissecting material for the medical colleges of the District of Columbia, and to afford better protection to the graves of the dead from desecration. The report made on said bill and submitted to the House of Representatives states fully the objects and the necessity for its passage, with which your committee agree, and herewith incorporate the same as a part of their report, as follows:

"The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. ——) entitled 'A bill for the promotion of anatomical science, and to prevent the desecration of graves,' having had the same under consideration, report it back with a favorable recommendation.

"The object of the bill is twofold: First and chiefly, to provide sufficient dissecting material for the medical colleges of the District of Columbia; and secondly and indirectly, to afford better protection to the graves of the dead from desecration.

"There are now several flourishing medical schools in Washington well established, and one or more of them of long standing. It is known to all that such institutions can not be carried on or proper training for the practice of medicine and surgery be given without ample experience in the dissection of the human cadaver. This fact is recognized and approved by all, and yet public opinion as strongly approves and demands stringent laws for the punishment of the desecration of graves in order to procure the necessary dissecting material. Hence, the laws of the District are very severe, and properly so, against the crime of grave-robbing. With such laws in operation and such necessities for the schools of medicine, the authorities of the District are compelled either to wink at this offense or seriously to cripple, if not to destroy, the efficiency and success of these schools. Furthermore, the heads of these institutions, professors, and students of science are compelled to supply their admitted necessities by confederating with and employing professional grave-robbers, and constantly to incur the risk of detection and criminal prosecution; and it being known in a community that the trade of resurrecting bodies for dissection is a common one, kindred and friends are frequently tortured with anxiety lest the hand of the resurrectionist shall remove the bodies of their dead.

"This bill is intended to relieve from such fears, to do away with the necessity or temptation for violating the laws, and at the same time in an open and legal way to provide the requisite dissecting material for the study and advancement of anatomical science in the District. A careful comparison with the statutes of some of the States shows its provisions to be prudently and aptly framed, and intended to accomplish the purpose in view in a manner as little repellant to public sentiment and sensibility as practicable."

For the above reasons your committee return said bill with the recommendation that it do pass as amended.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. M. & J. D. MORRISON.

The bill (S. 353) for the relief of J. D. Morrison, surviving partner of C. M. & J. D. Morrison, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $408.10 to J. D. Morrison, surviving partner of C. M. & J. D. Morrison, of Rockbridge County, Virginia, being the excess of taxes improperly and unlawfully collected of them for whisky distilled by them in January, 1866.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M. M'CLINTOCK.

The bill (S. 936) for the relief of John M. McClintock was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to reopen and reconsider the claim of John M. McClintock for the refunding of certain taxes alleged to have been improperly and illegally assessed and collected, amounting to $3,600, as claimed by him in the papers now on file in the Treasury Department; and, if upon reopening and reconsidering the claim, the commissioner shall find these taxes, or any part thereof, to have been illegally or improperly assessed and collected, he is to audit and ascertain the amount of taxes so illegally and improperly collected, deducting, however, any legal unpaid taxes which the claimant should have paid and did not pay, if any there shall be, under section 103 of the act of June 30, 1864. The Secretary of the Treasury is to pay the amount of taxes so found by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to have been illegally and improperly assessed and collected to John M. McClintock.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

G. W. CANDEE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 725) for the relief of Maj. G. W. Candee.

Mr. PLUMB. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under the rule.

WILLIAM H. MORGAN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 528) for the relief of William H. Morgan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill is reported adversely.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that it go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will go over.

L. MADISON DAY.

The bill (S. 266) for the relief of L. Madison Day was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to L. Madison Day of $5,400, being the amount of purchase-money received by the United States from Day for a square of ground in the town of Hurstville, La., condemned as the property of Judah P. Benjamin, and sold by the United States as their own and as free from mortgage, but which turned out to be a mistake, and the purchaser was evicted in consequence of the enforcement of a mortgage which the Government, through its officers, had caused to be erased and canceled by the recorder of mortgages, and whose genuine and proper certificate showing the erasure and cancellation of the mortgage was embodied in, as well as annexed to, the deed given to the purchaser.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CITIZENS' NATIONAL BANK OF LOUISVILLE.

The bill (S. 952) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the Citizens' National Bank of Louisville, Ky., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BECK. I made no report in that case. The Comptroller of the Currency prepared the bill himself, and it was approved by the Committee on Finance.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HARRY I. TODD.

The bill (S. 30) for the relief of Harry I. Todd, late keeper of the Kentucky penitentiary, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize Henry I. Todd, late keeper of the Kentucky penitentiary to institute and prosecute an action, within six months, in the Court of Claims, against the United States, for the recovery of the amount of internal-revenue taxes alleged to have been improperly collected from him between the years 1863 and 1868, as the duly elected and qualified keeper of the Kentucky penitentiary, on manufactured articles produced at the institution by convict labor alone, and on account of other operations of that institution by him under the laws of the State of Kentucky.

Mr. INGALLS. What is probably the amount involved in this?

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Kansas will allow me to say a word. The bill passed the Senate at the last Congress on a full report, and was reported favorably and passed the Senate at a previous session. There is a report in the case, though it is not noted on the Calendar, adopting the report made when the bill was passed in the last Congress. It is simply allowing Harry I. Todd, keeper of the Kentucky penitentiary, a State officer, as he claims, to go before the Court of Claims and show that he was not subject to certain internal-revenue taxes.

Mr. INGALLS. That is reasonable. I ask how much is the amount probably involved in it?

Mr. BECK. The amount involved is $35,000.

Mr. INGALLS. What were the tax payments?

Mr. BECK. On the profits of the labor in the Kentucky penitentiary. The proposition is only to allow the matter to go before the Court of Claims for examination.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATES OF DECEASED KICKAPOOS.

The bill (S. 632) to provide for the settlement of the estates of deceased Kickapoo Indians in the State of Kansas, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

The bill (S. 54) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. MORGAN. I think this is not a bill that ought to be considered under the five-minute rule. It is a bill which probably will lead to some discussion, or at all events it ought to be explained to the Senate. The chairman of the committee should have an opportunity of explaining it. I hope he will consent that the bill be made a special order for some day, and that he will make a motion to that effect.

Mr. DAWES. It is a very important bill, and ought to pass, if at all, at a very early day. I agree with the Senator that the importance of it is such that it is hardly possible to expect it to go through under this rule; and if the Senate will accede to the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama and let it be taken up at some given time, I should prefer that course rather than to attempt to pass it under this rule. If it goes over to the other Calendar there is no knowing when we can get it up.

Mr. INGALLS. A majority can take it up at any time.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware of that; but it is pretty difficult to get one bill taken out of the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS. Not if a majority want to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If objection be made the bill goes over under this rule.

Mr. ALLISON. That is enough.

Mr. DAWES. Before it goes over I should like to get the Senate to indicate some time when they will consider it. Will the Senator from Alabama suggest some time? I dislike very much to let this bill slip away in this manner.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no measure here that is to come in conflict with any time that might be suggested. I would propose a week from to-day.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senate will permit us to take it up a week from to-day immediately after 2 o'clock——

Mr. BLAIR. What is that?

Mr. DAWES. I presume the Senator's bill will be out of the way by that time. Say 2 o'clock a week from to-day, or immediately after the consideration of the educational bill, if it is not disposed of by that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The occupant of the chair does not see any advantage the Senator has by that over merely having it on the Calendar subject to motion. Still the motion is proper.

Mr. DAWES. It saves the effort of getting a vote of the Senate. That is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the bill be postponed until this day week, at 2 o'clock.

Mr. PLATT. I object to anything which makes a special order of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion does not make the bill a special order.

Mr. PLATT. Will not the adoption of the motion be considered as making the bill a special order for that time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No bill is made a special order unless it is made so by a motion made under the rule as to special orders.

Mr. INGALLS. By a two-thirds vote.

Mr. DAWES. If Senators are not disposed to fix a time to consider this bill, I shall have done my duty in asking the Senate to consider it; but I urge upon the Senate the necessity of the passage of the bill. It has been discussed in three separate sessions, and was passed by the Senate during the last Congress unanimously after the fullest possible discussion. All that will be required, I think, will be for the Senate to understand now what is the measure and it will pass without serious opposition.

Mr. MORGAN. I have suggested that the chairman of the committee ought to explain the nature of the bill and all its provisions, and he will not be able to do that under the five-minute rule. I do not care to debate the bill. I have expressed my opinions upon it heretofore.

Mr. DAWES. Under the circumstances I prefer to let the Senate go on under the rule until some one raises an objection.

Mr. TELLER. I will object to it now, then. I do not think this bill ought to be considered under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, being objected to, goes over.

Mr. DAWES. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill at this time notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 54) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, in section 7 I find this language:

> And no State or Territory shall pass or enforce any law denying any such Indian within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law.

I presume that no State would enact any such legislation; but it is a query in my mind what effect a declaration of Congress has upon the power of a State to do whatever it pleases. I do not understand that it is within the constitutional power of Congress to declare what a State shall do or what it shall not do, and I therefore move to strike out the words "State or," before the word "Territory," as, in the first place, nugatory; and, in the second place, as in violation of what is within the constitutional powers of this body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas will be reported.

The SECRETARY. In section 7, line 6, after the word "no," it is proposed to strike out "State or;" so as to read:

> And no Territory shall pass or enforce any law denying any such Indian within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of line 19, section 7:

> Without in any manner impairing or otherwise affecting the right of any such Indian to tribal or other property.

The question is sometimes raised whether an Indian by becoming a citizen of the United States does not lose his claim to the tribal property which the tribe holds in common, and this is to prevent any such construction as that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I move to strike out, in the third line of section 9, the word "and," between the words "Chickasaws" and "Seminoles," and after the word "Seminoles" to insert "and Osages;" so as to make the section read:

> SEC. 9. That the provision of this act shall not extend to the reservations of the Cherokees, Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Seminoles, and Osages in the Indian Territory, nor to any of the reservations of the Seneca Nation of New York Indians in the State of New York.

Mr. DAWES. I have no objection to that.

Mr. TELLER. I just want to say one word. The Osage Indians are a very sturdy race, and have recently taken a very advanced step in the cause of education by providing for the compulsory education of their children of school age. They made application to the Interior Department about a year and a half ago to be known hereafter as the sixth civilized tribe, and their ambition is to be so known and to be civilized. I should like to have them inserted with those tribes that we recognize as the civilized tribes.

Mr. DAWES. They have adopted a written constitution and a government after the manner and similitude of ours. How nearly it approaches to that I suppose it is difficult to tell; but they are evidently as far advanced in all the stages of civilization as the other five tribes, and I think it commendable that they should seek to be put on the same footing.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to make an observation before the amendment is adopted. This bill, judging by the remarks of the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Massachusetts, seems to proceed on the theory that only those Indians shall be treated to the luxury of the severalty provisions who are barbarous, and who are therefore, as we suppose, the least able to take care of themselves. Here are the Osage Indians, who, according to the concurrent testimony of those Senators, are very far advanced on the road to high civilization. They have compulsory education; they have a large amount of money; they have done a great many things, according to these statements, which would seem to indicate that they are proper subjects for self-government, and if that be the case it seems to me they are the very Indians on whom we should experiment with these severalty provisions.

Now, to take these shining lights among the Indians, the highest example of what they can do, those who have the largest amount of land, and who ought by all rules to set the best example as to individuality, and set them apart, and put them out of the pale of any provision of this kind, and then to take up the poor savages down in Arizona, and the mud-eaters up in Washington Territory, and the Digger Indians of California, and all that class who are the lowest in the scale of humanity of any of the Indians, and require them to stand alone, to pick them out and say to them, "root, hog, or die," with the certainty that it will be "die," seems to me to be a refinement of cruelty which I would hardly have expected of my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, this is a very important bill in reference to the Indians. It has been considered, as I have already said, a great many times in the Senate. To the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] more than to any other Senator is due the credit of this which I believe will be considered hereafter one of the wisest measures with reference to the Indian. I have no doubt that if it should be applied to what are called the five civilized tribes of Indians, it would be the best thing possible in its application to them. I think that the five tribes have arrived at a stand-still, and that that stand-still grows out of the character of their title, and that character of title is precisely the same as to the Osages. They hold in common.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will pause. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, it being now 2 o'clock, which is the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from New Hampshire will allow me to finish my most interesting remarks.

Mr. BLAIR. I suppose the Senator does not care to occupy a great deal of time, and I am desirous to finish the educational bill to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire object to the Senator from Massachusetts closing his remarks?

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to inquire of the Senator how much time he wants.

Mr. DAWES. I would say a few words only in response to the remarks of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BLAIR. Let the unfinished business be informally laid aside.

Mr. INGALLS. The remarks can as well be made on the educational bill.

Mr. DAWES. The reason this bill does not apply to the five tribes—and that is the same reason why it should not apply to the Osages—is that they hold an absolute patent to their lands in common, so that they can not be subdivided into severalty holdings; and I think that one of the most serious misfortunes attending the whole effort to cause the Indian to cease to be an Indian. It has been up to a certain stage a help in the advancement of these Indians, but in my opinion it has now reached its limits, and hereafter as they continue to hold in common it is difficult for me to see how much progress beyond that will be made.

Certain tribes hold what may be called a treaty title and certain other tribes a statute title, and many occupy land simply under an executive order. The application of this bill is first to those that hold under treaty and statute title and provides for their consent. Then a certain part of the bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to take Indians on reservations held by executive order, just as fast and as far as they are sufficiently advanced, and put them upon such land with a holding in severalty.

There is no way to apply this bill to the five tribes or the Osages, because they hold a fee, and the present condition of public sentiment in those nations is such that I do not think it would be wise to agitate that question just at this moment; and that is the reason why the exception is made. It is not from the fact that we are treating the poor Indians outside of these reservations in one way and in a better and more favored way; but it is because we can not quite reach them now as they are that they are excepted. I trust the time is not far distant when the holding in severalty will prevail all over this country among Indians as well as white men.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] has the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. On what bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am perfectly aware of that. Have I not a right to take the floor upon it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair has just taken the chair.

Mr. PLUMB. I make the point that the school bill is not the regular order. It was displaced by a vote of the Senate. It has not been laid before the Senate, as I understand, and I do not think that it is entitled to be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair understands that the school bill was laid before the Senate at 2 o'clock and is the regular order for consideration now.

The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

L. MADISON DAY.

Mr. COCKRELL. I happened not to be present; was unavoidably detained from the Senate Chamber during the morning hour, and I find that Order of Business 100, the bill (S. 266) for the relief of L. Madison Day, was passed without any discussion in the Senate. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed. It is a bill that I do not think ought to pass, and I never have thought so. It was passed without any attention being called to it.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Let me ask the Senator to name again the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill for the relief of L. Madison Day.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. When was it passed?

Mr. COCKRELL. This morning in the morning hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I now yield the floor to my distinguished friend from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. I feel grateful to my most admired colleague in the Senate, the brilliant luminary from the West, the most illustrious of all the illustrious representatives of the great State of Missouri, the paragon of ability and the great pride of America on this floor. I thank him for his courtesy. I wish further to say that I do not desire myself to occupy longer time in the discussion of the educational bill. I suppose there are others who wish to address the Senate and I yield the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 129) to protect homestead settlers within railway limits, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 4177) to reduce the fee on domestic money-orders for sums not exceeding $5; and

A bill (H. R. 4415) to make the allowances for clerk-hire to postmasters of the first and second class post-offices cover the cost of clerical labor in the money-order business, and for other purposes.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Education and Labor to strike out section 13 of the bill.

The section was read, as follows:

SEC. 13. That there shall be appropriated and set apart the sum of $2,000,000, which shall be allotted to the several States and Territories on the same basis as the moneys appropriated in the first section, which shall be known as the school-house fund, and which shall be paid out annually to each State and Territory, at the end of the year, until said sum of $2,000,000 shall be exhausted, and no longer, to be expended for the erection and construction of school-houses for the use of pupils attending the common schools in sparsely populated districts where the local communities shall be comparatively unable to bear the burdens of taxation. Such school-houses shall be built in accordance with modern plans, which plans shall be furnished free on application to the Bureau of Education, in Washington: Provided, however, That not more than $100 shall be paid from said fund toward the cost of any single school-house, nor more than one-half the cost thereof in any case; and the States and Territories shall annually make full report of all expenditures from the school-house fund to the Secretary of the Interior as in case of other moneys received under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I move to add to the first section of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That no money shall be paid to a State, or any officer thereof, until the Legislature of the State shall by bill or resolution accept the provisions of this act, and such acceptance shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior.

I do not desire to debate the amendment. I do not suppose that the Senator who has the bill in charge will object to it.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know that there is any objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I move, in line 4 of section 2, to strike out the words "of the age of ten years and over," between "being" and "can not," and to insert "between the age of ten and twenty-one years;" so as to read:

That such money shall annually be divided among and paid out in the several States and Territories in that proportion which the whole number of persons in each who, being between the age of ten and twenty-one years, can not write bears to the whole number of such persons in the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Senator if he will not modify his amendment. The school age provided or recognized by the laws of the several States varies. Instead of being from ten to twenty-one years, the school age in some States is from six to twenty-one, in some from seven to twenty-one, and in some from five to twenty-one. I do not want to make any suggestion that would hurt the bill or lose it a vote under any circumstances; but I simply ask the Senator from Kansas if he will not modify his amendment so as to say, "the school age recognized by the laws of the several States," or say, "between seven and twenty-one" instead of "between ten and twenty-one."

Mr. INGALLS. I used the language I have proposed because the census tables contain statistics of the persons who can not write in the several States of the Union between the ages of ten and twenty-one years. The object of this section is to define the basis upon which the distribution of the money is to be made, and my purpose is, if possible, to have that distribution made upon the basis of the illiteracy that it is proposed to cure; in other words, the remediable illiteracy.

Every one understands that in the States lately in rebellion, who will obtain the greater portion of this donation from the Treasury, a very large proportion of the illiterates consist of those who were such at the close of the war, who were at that period of time beyond the school age, and who of course never will attend any common schools for the purpose of obtaining any of the benefits of the money that is to be disbursed under this bill. It is manifestly unjust that, in those States which contain a very large per cent. of adult illiteracy, who must always remain illiterate, who were illiterate when the war closed, and were adults at that time, and who never can be made the recipients of the bounty of this bill, they should be used as a numerical basis in establishing a computation upon which this money is to be distributed.

I assume that the Senator from New Hampshire will make no objection to the adoption of this amendment. I presume it is an oversight, and that he would not be willing to have a system adopted which would enable the States containing this adult illiterate class to obtain an enormous disproportion of the money which would only be applied under the provisions of the bill itself to those persons who are of the school age in the different States which I have roughly assumed in my amendment to be included between the ages of ten and twenty-one years.

Mr. PLATT. It was suggested by the Senator from Virginia to the Senator from Kansas whether he would not base it upon the children who could not write within the school ages of the several States. Take my own State; the school age there is from four to sixteen. It will be easily seen that it would not be fair to put it upon that basis, because probably no children of four and five and six years could read.

Mr. INGALLS. I took the minor premiss in my amendment from the age fixed by the Senator from New Hampshire himself in his bill.

Mr. MORRILL. And the only one that can be ascertained by the census.

Mr. INGALLS. And as I understand it is the only one concerning which there are any existing data or information obtainable from the national census tables. The suggestion of the Senator from Virginia is appropriate, and if there were any way of making the bill uniform in its operation and at the same time to include the suggestion made by the Senator from Virginia I should be very glad to have that done, for the purpose that I have in view is that which he intimates, and that is to make this benefaction, if it shall be agreed to by Congress, applicable to those who would be the beneficiaries of the common-school system in each of the States in the Union, and to make that class the basis of computation as to the amount which each of the States is to receive under the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. The suggestion of the Senator from Virginia would be impracticable in actual operation. It would destroy the efficiency of the bill by the confusion that it would create in the effort of administration. The school ages vary so much in the different States that the Senator will see, I think, in a moment that distribution dependent upon the basis of the school ages of the different States would be unwise. For instance, in some States the school age is from eight to fifteen, in several States it is from four or five to twenty-one, and so the variation in school age under the statutes of the several States is such as would create the utmost confusion in administration.

In regard to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas, if there were a homogeneous condition of education throughout the country and an equality of capacity to maintain schools it would undoubtedly be a just system of distribution. This matter, however, was fully discussed in the three weeks' debate which we had two years ago, and if the Senator was present (he might not have been, of course) at the discussion, I think he will remember that it was then fully considered in debate.

The object of the bill, the object of giving this temporary aid, is to place the major part of the benefaction, or contribution, or appropriation, or whatever it may be called, where there exists the greatest necessity for its use. It is, of course, well understood that the most of it—I believe, as near as can be ascertained by calculation, about two-thirds of the amount that will be distributed under the bill will go into what are known as the Southern States. It will be seen that those who are educable, that is, those who are within the school ages, or between the age of ten and twenty-one and are still likely to attend school and so get the advantages of education, are just about as many in one State as in another. There may be more in the Southern States, for the reason that it is quite possible, and I think is true, that population increases more rapidly there than in some of the Northern States, so that there may be a somewhat larger proportion of those who need education between the years during which they are likely to attend school in the South than in the North. But there is no substantial difference probably in that regard, so that upon the basis of distribution suggested by the Senator as much of this money in proportion to population would go to one part of the country as to another.

The bill has been denounced by a great many for the reason that it affords an opportunity for the distribution of small sums to the Northern States, who are rich, as it is said, and have need of nothing, and some of them perhaps, it is said by those who oppose the bill, would refuse to accept anything that appears like a pittance from the National Government, for they can educate their children themselves. Now, this proposition from one Senator from Kansas is a proposition to give to a State like Kansas, or a State like New York, or a State like Massachusetts, each of which has large means of education, whose people are comparatively rid of this discreditable figure of illiteracy which we find abounding in the census—it is a proposition to give those States exactly the same proportion of the money distributed according to the number of those who are to attend school as is given to any other part of the country whatever.

It is a very different and antagonistic proposition to that which the other Senator from Kansas has advocated, formerly at least, upon this floor. To adopt such a basis of distribution would of course practically nullify the greater purpose of the bill itself, which is to give temporary aid and to give it where it is now most needed. If this were a bill providing appropriations for all time, if it were the basis upon which the education of the children of the country for all time was to rest, it would be probably the just basis of distribution, unless you had a distribution according to population; but for a temporary use, in order that the mass of the money may go where there is the least ability to bear taxation, where schools need to be established, where the system itself needs as it were to be acclimated, to be introduced, established, its ramifications made as extensive there as they are elsewhere in the country, and that the population for a limited period of time may be educated until they can reach something like the general par of education throughout the country, this proposition would be a nullification of the terms of the bill.

I trust that the amendment will not be pressed, and at all events if pressed that it may be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 7, noes 11; not a quorum voting.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 4, after the word "being," it is proposed to strike out the words "of the age of ten years and over" and insert the words "between the age of ten and twenty-one years;" so as to read:

That such money shall annually be divided among and paid out in the several States and Territories in that proportion which the whole number of persons in each who, being between the age of ten and twenty-one years, can not write bears to the whole number of such persons in the United States.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSOM (when Mr. VANCE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. VANCE] is necessarily absent to-day. He is paired on this bill with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. If my colleague were here he would vote "nay." I do not know how the Senator from Missouri would vote.

Mr. COCKRELL (when Mr. VEST's name was called). My colleague [Mr. VEST] is necessarily detained from the Senate to-day by sickness, and is paired, as announced, with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. I am inclined to think that if my colleague were here he would vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM. I did not know how he would vote and so stated.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am paired on the bill and the amendment with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired generally with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] on political questions. He is kept away from the Senate to-day by illness, but he informed me the other day that he agreed with me generally on this bill, and believing that he would vote "yea" on this amendment, I shall vote "yea."

Mr. BERRY. My colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. If my colleague were here he would vote "nay." I do not know how the Senator from Indiana would vote.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Butler,	Edmunds,	Maxey,	Sewell,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. In section 8 there is a provision that "a part of the money apportioned to each State or Territory, not exceeding one-tenth thereof, may yearly be applied to the education of teachers for the common schools," &c., but without any delegation of authority to determine the question of such appropriation. The governor seems to be the unit of power in this bill, and I presume that in the absence of any specific provision on the subject the governor himself would determine where this money should go. I do not suppose the Senator from New Hampshire desired to produce that result. I think, at all events, it ought to be so amended that the Legislature alone should determine the diversion of this money for the education of teachers. I therefore move to add in line 3, at the beginning of section 8, the words "by the direction of the Legislature of such State or Territory;" so as to read:

That by the direction of the Legislature of such State or Territory a part of the money apportioned to each State or Territory, not exceeding one-tenth thereof, may yearly be applied, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment moved by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. BLAIR. There does not seem to be any earthly use in putting in those words. This bill is the result of three months' debate and careful examination and the closest possible scrutiny by the Republican caucus in the last Congress. They considered every line and syllable, every abbreviation and every punctuation point, and it was thought that the bill was as sufficiently restricted and close in its provisions with reference to the expenditure of this money as the wit of man could make it. Nobody has ever understood but that this money when it had been paid over to the State authorities would be expended by the State authorities that control the State. There is no provision here that it shall be expended by the governor, or that it shall be expended by the Legislature, or that it shall be expended by the superintendent of public schools, but it is left to the free action of the State to dispose of this money for the year for which it has been appropriated just as it disposes of other money, subject to the trusts that are provided in the bill itself. An amendment of this sort is trifling in its character and would be of no earthly use other than to serve as a precedent for doing what might keep us at work here interminably upon equally inconsequential points, as I think they are.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator is going to get this bill through in much of a hurry he may find possibly before he gets it through that it may be well to yield to some sensible suggestions about its terms.

I am not aware, in the first place, that the Senator from New Hampshire has stated the truth when he says that this bill in its terms was agreed upon by a Republican caucus. The Senator so stated, and I want him to have the benefit of the general knowledge of the fact that he made that statement. I deny it myself.

Mr. BLAIR. My attention was diverted; I should like the Senator from Kansas to repeat what he has just said, if he will.

Mr. PLUMB. This bill, whether framed by a Republican caucus, although that is a very immaculate body, I know, or by the Committee on Education and Labor, still more immaculate, or by anybody else, is not to come into this body and to be treated like a sacred bull of Burmah, not to be touched by irreverent hands. If it is to become a law, it ought to represent the ultimate judgment of the law-making power, it ought to be subjected to scrutiny, and there ought to be no objection such as the Senator from New Hampshire has made to proper amendments; and he himself, except in a petulant way, has not referred to the point which I made in regard to the propriety of this amendment. He simply desires to get through with the bill. I do not suppose that a mob in the streets of Paris ever was so anxious to get at the blood of a human being as the Senator from New Hampshire is to get this bill through, and the rationale of the two operations is about the same, I should think.

I say that this bill does nowhere provide, in any specific terms or by any fair inference, what power in the State, if any, shall have the right to divert the one-tenth of this fund which goes to the several States for the purpose of the education of teachers. The governor certifies to the Secretary of the Interior what are regarded as the material facts upon which the apportionment is to be made, and, those facts having been certified, the payment of the money is mandatory; that is to say, he certifies it to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury then has to pay to the properly constituted authorities of the State their proportion of the money going to the State.

If we were to stop there and make no provision at all as to what should be done with the money, that would be all right. We should then give it over into the hands of the State officers, and they might deposit it with their own private funds, or use it for school purposes or any other purposes, and our concern would be gone. But we have assumed in this bill some control over the question as to what shall be done with the money, and we specifically provide in section 8 that not exceeding one-tenth of it may yearly be diverted for the purpose of the education of teachers for the common schools therein. Where is the objection to saying that the Legislature of the State shall determine that diversion? If it is not to be the Legislature, then what other power?

I am satisfied the bill will pass this body at least; but while I am opposed to it, if it is to pass I desire that it shall be reasonably guarded, and if it is to become a law that it may, at least in form, be such as will be no reflection upon the body that passed it.

If, as the Senator says, this is simply nugatory, then where can be the objection to the amendment. It does no hurt; it makes specific that which he himself has not undertaken to say is now specific and certain. He has referred to no provision in the bill as evidencing the authority or power to divert this money which may be allotted to any State, and unless something of this kind is done one of two things will happen, either the individual officer to whom the money is turned over will do as he pleases about it, or there will be a confusion of authority, which will prevent anything from being done.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas, in order to save the repetition of the same words, whether his object would not be effected as well by inserting after the word "may," in line 2 of section 8, the words "in the discretion of its Legislature."

Mr. PLUMB. That would accomplish the purpose.

Mr. HOAR. It would save repeating the words.

Mr. BLAIR. What is the suggestion?

Mr. HOAR. After the word "may," in line 2, to insert the words "in the discretion of its Legislature."

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Kansas, however, has the floor.

Mr. PLUMB. That accomplishes the same purpose. I am not wedded to the form of words, and I did not understand the Senator from Massachusetts to make a verbal criticism.

Mr. HOAR. No; I did not.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I understood the Senator from Kansas to say that the money would be drawn on the warrant of the governor or other officer. Section 4 provides that this money "shall be paid over to such officer as shall be authorized by the laws of the respective States and Territories to receive the same." I think the Senator is mistaken in his statement that it is to be drawn on the warrant of the governor of the State or any other officer. It is a legislative enactment that is provided for; but if the Senator is right, I agree with him in his amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not state that it was to be drawn on the warrant of the governor; I stated that it was to be drawn from the Treasury by warrant of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the requisition of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It is to be drawn from the Treasury in that way, but is to be paid to the State, and it is to be paid to such officer or officers as the Legislature of the State shall indicate.

Mr. PLUMB. That is merely a deposit; that is, the money is to be deposited with them. The question is, what shall be done with the money? We have assumed here to give direction, or at least to specify, what may be done with it. All I want to provide is that what is to be done with it shall be directed by the Legislature of the State, and not left to the discretion of individuals. I want the Legislature of Virginia, or of New Hampshire, or of any other State that may choose to divert a portion of this money, if it thinks fit to do so, to take specific and determinate action on that point, and not leave it to an individual officer of the State.

I will modify my amendment by accepting the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, and inserting after the word "may," in line 2 of section 8, the words "in the discretion of its Legislature."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 8, line 2, after the word "may," it is proposed to insert "in the discretion of its Legislature;" so as to read:

That a part of the money apportioned to each State or Territory, not exceeding one-tenth thereof, may, in the discretion of its Legislature, yearly be applied to the education of teachers for the common schools therein, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] as modified.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire first of all to apologize to my friend from Kansas. I must have said something to hurt his feelings, and our relations have been so pleasant thus far that I would not have anything in the world to happen to produce a single disagreeable moment; I would rather submit myself to the last penalty of existence; and so I apologize, and in all good nature.

But the point he raises is not so inconsequential as in his advocacy of it it might seem. The theory of the bill is that whatever is appropriated goes to the State as a State, to be appropriated by the State as a State in accordance with certain restrictions and trusts which are specified in the body of the bill. It does not undertake to say what any State officer shall do; it assumes no direction or control over any particular element of the governing power of the State, but leaves the State as a State in her sovereignty to dispose of the fund. The Legislature may provide that the governor shall dispose of it, the governor may apply it under existing laws, and the one-tenth may be appropriated in that way, or the one-tenth may not be appropriated in that way. The bill simply provides that the one-tenth may be so appropriated, thus liberating the fund from a trust which otherwise would apply to the entire amount, that it should go to the common school itself proper.

If we are to begin by amending the bill in a way that the Legislature shall do this part of the work of distribution; that the governor shall do that part of the work of distribution; that the superintendent of education shall do this, that, or the other, and that the county boards of education shall do this, and shall do that, and something else, and thus undertake to diversify our method of control by assuming direct power over the various agencies of the State and to direct them how they shall perform their functions in the distribution of this money, we had better dispense with the State as an organization altogether, and lay our hand directly upon the individual, and thus abolish the entire theory upon which the bill is based.

It is for that reason that I am opposed to the amendment. If I were willing to do that, I should be willing to adopt instead of this measure a bill that should establish national schools out and out in the States; that we would control the teacher; that we would control the superintendent of education; that we would control the child; that we would educate him, and abolish the State so far as its educational work is concerned.

The bill simply passes the money to the State as a State, and she provides her own agencies and methods of distributing it; and if she does not apply each year's appropriation in accordance with the trust specified in the bill, she gets no more. That is all. I am opposed to the amendment because I think it is a pernicious one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]?

Mr. BLAIR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. Before the vote is taken I desire to say that I regard the amendment as not having the slightest effect upon the legal meaning of the bill; but as some Senators here think that the bill is ambiguous, and that this amendment removes the ambiguity, I am perfectly willing to vote for it.

The Secretary called the roll.

Mr. KENNA. I am paired generally with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN], but, concurring as I do with him about this bill, I vote "yea."

Mr. COKE (after having voted in the affirmative). I remember that I am paired for an hour with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], and I withdraw my vote. I do not know how the Senator from Kentucky would vote. I should vote "yea" if he were here.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He is not present and has not voted.

Mr. HALE. I am paired with him generally. I do not know how he would vote on this question, so I shall not vote.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 17; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the first portion of the bill, in section 1, which reads:

That for eight years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury the following sums, &c.

That is mandatory; it does not use the ordinary expression in every other bill, "out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," but makes it a command, that if there be money in the Treasury at all, that money must be devoted to the payment of this claim. To obviate that, and to place this like other claims against the Government in the event the bill should pass, I move to amend the bill by adding, in the fourth line of the first section, after the word "Treasury," the words:

Not otherwise appropriated to the current expenses of the Government, including interest on the public debt, the amount provided by law for the sinking fund, and appropriations for pensions.

So as to read:

That for eight years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to the current expenses of the Government, including interest on the public debt, the amount provided by law for the sinking fund, and appropriations for pensions, the following sums, namely: The first year," &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on this amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I submit to the Senator from Texas that his suggestions will not in any way impair the force of this present provision. The language of all appropriation bills is to appropriate money "not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. MAXEY. That expression is not in the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand it is not in the bill, but the requirement of the bill will be as strong, it seems to me, after the amendment of the Senator from Texas is adopted as it is now. I do not think he impairs in any way by his amendment the force of the present language of the bill, and I should be glad to have him state wherein he thinks there is a limitation provided by his amendment.

Mr. MAXEY. I hope that every Senator will take that view of the case. In my judgment the obligation which Congress has taken in the face of all the world to pay the interest on the public debt, to make provision by a sinking fund for the ultimate extinction of the debt itself, to pay the current expenses of the Government, and to pay the pensions makes them proper claims, which should come in in preference to this mere gratuity, this mere shoveling out by wholesale of money from the Treasury without authority of the Constitution or of sound judgment. If this bill should become a law and the question should ever spring up hereafter, a State could refer to the wording of this bill, and say, "We have a prior right to walk into the Treasury, and if we find in the Treasury money not otherwise appropriated"—the bill does not say that—but "if we find in the Treasury any money, we have a right to apply that money to the purposes of this bill," because this bill says "there shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury the following sums."

I say the bill differs from every other bill that has ever been before Congress since I have been a member of the Senate. I say that the expression "not otherwise appropriated" ought to be there, and to make the thing beyond peradventure, I reiterate that the debts, which in my judgment are proper debts and ought in all conscience to take precedence of any appropriation whatever made by Congress, to wit, the current expenses of the Government, the interest on the public debt, for which the honor of this country is pledged, the extinguishment of the debt itself by the sinking fund, which is a preferred debt, and the pledge to pay the pensions should come in in preference to this bill, which makes no provision whatever that anybody shall be provided for, not even the current expenses of the Government. If money is in the Treasury, according to this bill, it must come out. Whether that was the design, or whether it is an oversight, is not my business. I find the language as it is.

I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. ALLISON. The point I desire to make and submit to the Senator from Texas is this: What is the force of this provision as it stands now? Suppose there was in it no word of appropriation, suppose instead of using the words used here it said that "the following sums are hereby devoted to public education in the States," and then went on with the remainder of the bill without in any way alluding to the question of appropriation, would there be an honorable obligation or would there not be? That is the question I desire answered. Would there not be an honorable obligation then, on the part of the Government, to each year appropriate the sums herein prescribed? And if there was not money enough in the Treasury to pay the current expenses, the interest on the public debt, and the other items enumerated in the Senator's amendment, would not Congress be required to place such additional sum in the Treasury either by borrowing money or by levying additional taxes as would enable the Government to comply with the terms of the bill? In others words, I should be glad to have the Senator from New Hampshire state whether he does not regard this bill, without specific words of appropriation, as binding Congress and the Government of the United States, if these conditions are complied with, to devote $77,000,000 for purposes of aiding public schools in the States during the period mentioned in this bill.

I desired to call attention to the general provisions in order to show, if I could, that the limitation proposed by the Senator from Texas does not in any way impair the obligation that we shall be under to the several States of the Union to devote $77,000,000 in aid of public education, if they will comply in good faith with the terms which we have here laid down. When this bill passes, is it not as much of an obligation on the part of the General Government as is the obligation to pay the interest on the public debt or any other obligation that we have incurred, whether there be in this bill any words appropriating money or promising to appropriate money? Is not the passage of the bill a promise that we will devote this vast of sum money to the purpose of education, and that Congress will hereafter make the necessary appropriations to carry out the provisions of this bill?

So, if I understand the bill, whether there are in it words of appropriation or suggestions of appropriation or not, if this bill passes we are bound to make the appropriations from year to year if the States comply with their part of the obligation of this bill.

Mr. MAXEY. I hope that every member of the Senate will take that view of the question; but I have found by long experience in life that when you want to make a contract the best thing to do is to make it at the time and insert all the terms of the contract in the agreement then and there made, and not supply them by argument, as the Senator from Iowa is now doing, supposing that it may hereafter be so construed. Let us construe the bill now, that these obligations, the payment of the interest on the public debt, the current expenses of the Government, provision for the sinking fund to extinguish the debt itself, and the pensions, shall be first fulfilled and that then shall come the appropriation now made.

Mr. ALLISON. But, Mr. President, that is an implication, I submit to the Senator, that the Government of the United States will create obligations by law and then will not fulfill those obligations by providing in the Treasury the money necessary for that purpose. So it seems to me if there be not one word in this bill said respecting the appropriation of money, if the bill shall pass and next year there is no appropriation made to carry out its provisions, those persons who are interested in it can fairly say that we have passed a bill providing for an expenditure of money and then refused to appropriate the necessary money to carry out that expenditure. That is my view of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. MAXEY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired for an hour with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were here, I should vote "yea." I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. RANSOM (when Mr. VANCE'S name was called). I have stated that my colleague [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. My colleague, if here, would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 30; as follows:

NAYS—10.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUTLER. May I have the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire for a moment, and also the attention of the Senator from Mississippi? I find in section 7 of this bill the following language:

That the design of this act not being to establish an independent system of schools, but rather to aid for the time being in the development and maintenance of the school system established by local government, and which must eventually be wholly maintained by the States and Territories wherein they exist.

I should be glad to know if the Senator from New Hampshire means by that language that the States and Territories are compelled by this act to keep the schools up to the standard at which they are left at the end of eight or ten years or whatever the time is. I should be glad to have the Senator from New Hampshire explain that.

Mr. BLAIR. In reply to the Senator's question I say that I do not.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I move to strike it out.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator's question is whether I understand that the States and Territories will necessarily be obliged to maintain their schools in the same condition that they are at the expiration of the eight years.

Mr. BUTLER. That seems to be the language of the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Oh, no; the Senator did not read the section to which that is introductory. This is the essential part of the section:

It is hereby provided that no greater part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out to any State or Territory in any one year than the sum expended out of its own revenues or out of moneys raised under its authority in the preceding year for the maintenance of common schools, not including the sums expended in the erection of school buildings.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I move to strike out all from the word "that," in the first line, down to and including the word "exist," in the sixth line, as those words seem to be entirely superfluous.

Mr. ALLISON. Then let section 7 begin—

No greater——

Mr. BUTLER. Let the word "that" be put in after "provided." I make the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. Beginning at section 7, it is moved to strike out all down to and including "exist," in line 6, the words stricken out being:

That the design of this act not being to establish an independent system of schools, but rather to aid for the time being in the development and maintenance of the school system established by local government, and which must eventually be wholly maintained by the States and Territories wherein they exist.

So as to read:

SEC. 7. It is hereby provided that no greater part of the money appropriated under this act shall be paid out to any State or Territory in any one year than the sum expended out of its own revenues or out of moneys raised under its authority in the preceding year for the maintenance of common schools, not including the sums expended in the erection of school buildings.

Mr. INGALLS. It is not necessary to retain the words "it is hereby provided." They should be omitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment just read.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest an amendment, to leave out the words "it is hereby provided," and let the section begin:

That no greater part of the money appropriated.

Mr. BUTLER. That point is well taken, and I so modify my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from South Carolina will be so modified. The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection to that amendment. It is merely to strike out a declaratory statement.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. In section 6, line 3, after the word "common," I move to strike out the words "and industrial."

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator be kind enough to state his amendment again?

Mr. INGALLS. It is to strike out "and industrial," so as to apply this money to the support of common schools.

Mr. BLAIR. In the Territories? The section relates to the Territories.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. CALL. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. In my view, industrial education is the great necessity of this country. I think it is absolutely necessary to the existence of the people of the United States in a condition of comfort and to the economies which are going to control the policies of the Government and our systems of industrial production. There is no more important part of this bill. I regard it as the most important legislation and the most beneficial which has occurred in this country for many years or which will occur during the existence of this Congress.

Universal education and industrial education are an absolute necessity to relieve the country of its pauperism, to produce comfort and abundance among all classes of people, to avoid the necessity of strikes, to furnish opportunities and means of labor to people who are in needy circumstances. The system has been adopted by foreign nations. The despotic governments of the world have established industrial education and have found it a great means of producing comfort among the people, of providing laborers who are at all times qualified to turn from one employment to another. I regard it as the most meritorious and beneficial feature of this bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I was controlled in my amendment by the language in section 10, to which I respectfully invite the attention of the Senator from Florida and the Senator from New Hampshire:

SEC. 10. That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used only for common schools, not sectarian in character, in the school districts of the several States and Territories, in such way as to provide, as near as may be, for the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age prescribed by the law of the State or Territory, &c.

In order to make this bill symmetrical, in order to make it harmonious and not inconsistent with itself, I simply moved to strike out that provision in section 6 to make it correspond with the declaration in section 10, upon which the Senator from Florida rises in a spirit of rebuke, and states that the industrial feature is the most important there is in this bill, when section 10 expressly declares that the money is to be used for common schools and not for industrial schools. I suppose that I yield to no person in a recognition of the importance of industrial schools; but this is not intended for the purpose of establishing industrial schools; it is a fund to procure the advantages of common-school education, what is technically known as such, and I submit that in view of the language in section 10 my amendment ought to be agreed to or that that section ought to be amended.

Mr. BLAIR. As the bill was originally draughted and reported at the last Congress this provision with reference to industrial schools applied to the whole country. There was a modification during the discussion, and the section with regard to the distribution of moneys in the States was so amended as to strike out the industrial feature. It remained in the section which had reference to the distribution of money in the Territories. This consideration entered into the action of the Senate, that the amount of money proposed to be appropriated by this bill was too small for the actual necessities of the common schools themselves, and the amendment was therefore made so far as the schools in the States were concerned, and might very well have been extended (for there it is comparatively a trivial matter) to the Territories. It was for that reason that it seemed to me, when the Senator from Kansas made his suggestion in the direction of uniformity and propriety in the entire appropriation, that the words might as well go out in accordance with his motion.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, Congress has heretofore made appropriations for the Territory of Alaska for industrial schools. Money has been appropriated and is now being expended there in that way. It has been supposed that in that Territory an industrial school was perhaps the best and most efficient way of educating the natives' children of the Territory, and the system has been commenced. Whatever would go to Alaska under this bill should go to these schools in accordance with the system already commenced and now working well there. I hope in regard to the Territories where some Indian schools and schools of other kinds might be assisted by this fund, the amendment will not be made. It does not apply to the States, but to the Territories, where, owing to the peculiar character of the people to be educated, some belonging to one race and some to another, it is very desirable that they should have whatever facilities this bill can give them.

Mr. BLAIR. I did not pass upon the resubmission of the bill to the Senate without observing that this provision was made for industrial schools in the Territories. I do not think it can be of much importance, unless it be in the Territory of Alaska; but, at the same time, it is a feature that I should have been glad to see retained in the entire bill. If there are those who object to striking out the words I shall vote to retain them, but it seemed to me it might be well enough to let them go with the rest. I do not think it will be a very appreciable advantage in the Territories.

Mr. CALL. I hope the amendment will not be adopted, and I shall move when the proper time arrives to insert this word "industrial" in the provision providing for the money to be applied for common schools in the States in the tenth section.

I can see no reason why the authorities of a State should not have the right to appropriate this money to industrial education as a part of the common-school education, and I can see no reason why the people of the Territories should not everywhere and all the people of the different States, where the States are not able to furnish it, should not receive aid from the General Government for that industrial education which is ascertained now to be a necessity for the welfare of every community, a necessity to provide employment for them, to relieve them from the pauperism that is extending throughout the country, and from the inequalities in the distribution of labor and the productions of labor everywhere.

It is an ascertained fact, by the experience of Germany and the despotic governments of the world and also of France, that industrial education is a necessity for the people and that it is fast doing away with the inequalities, the suffering, and the absolute poverty that come from the want of employment. People employed in our great factories—and factory employment is a great part of the industries of the country—are taught only one thing and are completely at the mercy of their employers. Turned out of that particular employment by its stopping or being unremunerative, they have nothing to do and no means by which to earn a livelihood; but under the system of industrial education they are qualified for more than one employment and they are able to earn a subsistence for themselves and to turn from one thing to another.

If we are contemplating this great subject of education, of fitting the people to take care of themselves and be useful factors to the State, I can see no reason why we should not adopt the system entirely and give the aid to the States, to be applied either to common-school education or to industrial education, for they are both practically the same and apply to the same classes of people. Nor can there be any reason why it should not be done in the Territories. As has been well observed by the Senator from Michigan, it is already a developed fact in the history of the country that such appropriations have done good and worked well in the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I do not understand that the question of industrial education is involved in this bill. The question is how to make a proper appropriation of this fund as between the States and Territories. I do not understand that under section 6 the Secretary of the Interior in the Territories would have the arbitrary division or allotment of this fund. I do not understand that in any of the Territories there are industrial schools which are maintained by public taxation or under any uniform law of the Territory. All these industrial schools I suppose to be private institutions, institutions for higher education; and I do not know by what rule the Secretary of the Interior could make an allotment in a Territory between the common schools and such private institutions. I do not understand that it is the intention of the law to give him the power of making an arbitrary division of this money between these different schools; but his division should be made to the various districts or subdivisions of the Territory according to the number of children of school age in the Territory.

I do not believe that this bill covers Alaska at all. I do not believe that Alaska is a Territory within the meaning of that word as used in the bill. I think the act providing a civil government for Alaska treats it as a district, calls it the "District of Alaska." It has not a full Territorial government; it has no school laws; it has no common schools; it has nothing from which its proportion of the money to be appropriated by this bill could be determined and allotted to the Territory. The industrial schools in Alaska are supported in part by appropriations which have been recently made by Congress for that purpose, but mainly by donations from religious bodies and from individuals. So far as appropriations have been made for common-school education, they are simply applied to schools that have been established under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, maintained by no law, the appropriation of the money regulated by no law; and it would be impossible to make any distribution of money appropriated by this act to Alaska Territory unless there were some arbitrary division and allotment of it by the Secretary of the Interior.

I say therefore that I do not think what is called the Territory of Alaska (which is a Territory so far as the land is concerned and in that sense only) is a Territory within the meaning of this section or of this bill. I think it is a district, having but an imperfect government, having no school system, and it ought not to be taken into consideration in the passage of this bill.

I do not see how the Secretary of the Interior can make any allotment to industrial schools which are maintained by voluntary subscription, to schools which are not governed by the laws of the States or Territories, and I think the words "industrial schools" should be stricken out wherever they occur in this bill.

Mr. TELLER. If the Territory of Alaska is not included in this bill it certainly ought to be. I am inclined to think it is, but if it is not I should like to offer an amendment that it shall be. I find in the last two statutes making appropriations that it is spoken of as "the Territory of Alaska." I should think it would come under the term "Territories."

I want to say a word about the industrial education in the Territories. The bill does not seem to deal with industrial schools except in the Territories, and there is really no industrial schools in the Territories. Industrial schools are only valuable, as I understand, in crowded communities, where there is a difficulty for those who are unfortunate in their poverty and in their inability to acquire trades and general business education. All through the Western country in the Territories there is no difficulty of that kind, and I do not know of any industrial schools in the Territories for the purpose of educating the Indians, and no provision is made for that class in this bill, as I understand it.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Territories have very little interest in this bill, the total amount that they will receive is so insignificant. For instance, the Territory of Arizona will receive a total sum of about $72,000 during the whole life of the bill. The Territory of Dakota, with its great population, will only get $69,000; Idaho Territory, $22,000; Montana Territory, about $21,000; Utah Territory, $109,000; Washington Territory, $48,000; and Wyoming, $6,000. The Territories have little or no interest in this bill, for when you divide $48,000 into eight years' payments it will make no considerable impression, in fact none at all, upon the educational resources of a Territory like Washington.

I do not suppose there is a Territory ever so poor, unless it may be Arizona, that has not a better educational system than a great number of the old and wealthy States. I know that is the case with some of the Northwestern Territories, at least. The very first thing the people who go to those Territories do is to establish a school system. The very first Legislature that assembled in Colorado, in the midst of civil war, with scarcely any women or children within the borders of the Territory, immediately passed an act establishing one of the most efficient free-school systems—and we have it to-day—of any State in the Union. From the very beginning they provided, even in the remote and thinly and sparsely settled regions, for the free education of all the children of that section, and established schools in communities where you would hardly suppose a school could be maintained.

I do not think it is necessary to keep in this bill any provision for industrial schools in the Territories; but I do think it was a very great mistake to strike out of the bill, as the Senator from New Hampshire says the committee did, the provision for the support of industrial schools in the States. I think industrial schools in very many of the States would, as the Senator from Florida says, be the solution of a very great difficulty, and especially in the crowded cities, in the great cities where the poor are unable to acquire the opportunities of skill necessary for conducting business or trade in a proper way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. CALL. If the amendment is adopted the sixth section may just as well be striken out entirely, because the tenth section provides for the distribution of money to the Territories as well as to the States. But I do not concur entirely with my friend from Colorado as to the absence of a necessity for the application of this money to industrial schools in the Territories. Unquestionably it is true that the great amount of unoccupied land, the facility with which it may be obtained, the mineral resources of the Territories, and the grazing interests furnish occupation and a comfortable subsistence to the people who are there; but we are in a country that is increasing millions every year. We have now sixty millions of people. The Western Territories are being populated rapidly, and the proposition I make is that it is an ascertained fact in this new world of new industries and new economies that industrial education is an absolute necessity to accompany common-school education everywhere; that a man can not be a useful citizen or factor in our civilization to-day without an industrial education, and that it is a necessity so pressing that it has been established by the despotic governments of the world among their people.

In France it is said that under the system of industrial education established in Paris and some other parts of the Republic of France pauperism has diminished rapidly, until now you can scarcely find any family who are without the means of support; and shall we shut our eyes to this fact in this country with a population growing beyond all estimation and covering with great rapidity the Territories of the West?

I think, therefore, sir, that the bill should distinctly recognize and provide for the application of this money in the discretion of the State and the Territorial authorities, and in company with a common-school education, with teaching them to read and write, also teaching them how to make a living, the employments of the hand which will enable them to be factors in the production of the country; and it applies just as well, and it ought to be made to apply, to the Territories as to the States.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Florida has convinced me that section 6 ought to be stricken out, as he suggests. The bill in its title declares the measure to be one "to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools," and section 10 declares specifically how the moneys that are provided for in this bill shall be distributed in the several States and Territories. Therefore section 6 is entirely superfluous, unless the intention be to include industrial schools in the Territories in addition to common schools as a part of the system; and I therefore move to strike out section 6.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas to strike out section 6 of the bill, which includes the previous amendment offered by him.

Mr. MORGAN. I agree with the Senator from Kansas that the section ought to be stricken out. There ought to be no discrimination in this bill between the States and Territories, some of them having industrial schools in addition to common schools, and others not being allowed to have the industrial schools. But I wish to call the attention of the Senate to another fact in regard to the bill, which I think the committee ought to reconsider, even though it requires that this bill should be sent back to the committee.

This bill proposes to distribute $77,000,000 among the States and Territories upon the basis of the illiteracy of the people over ten years of age in the States and Territories in 1880. The other day we had quite a long and earnest and important debate in the Senate upon the admission of Dakota into the Union, and it was then stated on all hands that Dakota had 400,000 population, a rich, prosperous community that was rapidly filling up. Now I find by going back to 1880, according to the table presented in the report of the committee or by the Senator from New Hampshire, that Dakota is credited in this bill with only 135,177 people, in all, of whom there 4,631 that can not write. If we are proposing to do justice between the different States and Territories, why do we go back to 1880 when these Territories had very sparse population, and take from them the advantage of the increase in their population from that time? The amount of money that would go to the Territory of Dakota during all this time would be $59,737 during the whole eight years. Alabama has only about three times the population that is alleged here for Dakota—about 1,250,000 people. Alabama gets under this bill for the whole time $5,370,848.45.

A bill was brought in the other day to admit Washington Territory into the Union. Washington had 75,116 people in 1880. It is now claimed that there are 150,000 people in Washington Territory. The illiterates in that Territory, as shown in this table, are 3,850. The amount of money coming during the eight years to Washington Territory, claiming now to be entitled to Statehood, is $48,186.66; and that, too, when Washington Territory and Dakota are now paying more money into the Treasury of the United States for public lands, perhaps, or at all events a greater number of population is going there to take the benefit of our homestead system, than in any of the old land States of the Union.

Now I take Montana Territory. It is credited in this report with 39,159 people and its illiteracy is 1,077, and what it would get under the bill is $31,151.46 for the whole time, for the entire eight years; not quite $4,000 a year.

If the Senate of the United States can afford to take $77,000,000 and distribute it among the people of the United States under this bill, and have the constitutional right to do it, can it not afford to take the time to do them justice? Can anybody defend this bill upon this statement? Have we the right to have these people pay their taxes, incur all the hardships of frontier life, start up the incipient foundations of society, including education, struggling as people never have to struggle in the older States for any purpose, and yet insist in the distribution of this money to put them back on the basis of population shown by the census of 1880, when their population has trebled and quadrupled at the time the bill passes? And, mark you, for eight years to come this basis of distribution is to be maintained. Dakota may have a million of people at the end of eight years, Washington Territory may have 500,000, and Montana may have 400,000 at the end of eight years, and yet you go on with the distribution upon the basis of 1880.

Mr. President, I know that whatever I say about this bill will be credited to an inveterate hostility against the measure; but if this bill is to become a law, I claim that it shall be so framed by the Senate of the United States as at least to show that we have some consideration for the principles of justice and equity in the distribution of the money. That is what I have to say about it.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, in regard to the necessity or the desirableness of retaining the Territories within the scope of the bill I have a word to say.

The Territory of New Mexico is very much dependent upon outside help for the establishment of any system of common schools that can be efficient there; and I believe there is no part of the whole country where the rate of illiteracy is so high as it is in that Territory. There are peculiar circumstances in that Territory which have led the superintendent of public instruction and the other friends of education in that Territory to write with great urgency setting forth their needs and their anxieties that this bill become a law on account of the provision that will be made for that Territory. It is very true that several of the other Territories will not receive large sums of money; but New Mexico will receive from the whole fund to be distributed between $700,000 and $800,000, say three-quarters of a million dollars. This would be to the Territory of New Mexico at least a Godsend, and there is no prospect of their getting efficient help from any other source whatever. As to the other Territories, they will receive something, and there is no difficulty whatever in the acceptance of the sum, however small it may be.

To preserve the symmetrical character of the bill, to give to all our population in proportion to the existing illiteracy on the basis of the census of 1880, which we adopt from necessity, there being no other basis, and which we can not reject until we take another census without occasioning great confusion, it was thought best to include these Territories. They are increasing rapidly in population, it is true, but most of the increase is from the educated people in the States and from the more intelligent class of foreign immigration, so that the standard of illiteracy in most of the Territories is low, though until perhaps recently Iowa supplanted them in that honorable distinction as having the lowest rate of illiteracy of any part of the entire country. Nevertheless these small sums which the Territories receive will help them a little and certainly can do no harm, while, as I said before, the Territory of New Mexico will be greatly benefited, and to it this money is almost indispensable.

So far as Alaska is concerned, if it is properly a Territory, I suppose it is included within the provisions of the bill. The amount that that Territory will receive will be greatly beneficial to it.

In regard to the striking out of this section which the Senator from Kansas has moved, the force of the section is not so much to designate whether the money shall go to the industrial or the common schools as it is to confide the discretion of the expenditure in the Secretary of the Interior. It was thought better to leave that money to him to be expended for the cause of education in his discretion than to leave it to the local Legislatures and the local authorities. There is great difficulty in one or two of the Territories, as the Senate will perceive by a moment's reflection, in securing the raising and the application of the necessary funds for education. New Mexico and Utah might be instanced; and it is a great deal better that this section should be retained in order that its provisions may be a portion of the act, confiding to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior the expenditure of the money which the Territory is to receive.

I hope the Senator will not insist on his amendment, for in this view I think that he himself will admit that it is quite important that the section should be retained in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to strike out section 6 of the bill.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 13, noes 15.

Mr. INGALLS. Was there a quorum voting?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was not.

Mr. INGALLS. It will not be possible to decide the question without a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is true.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COKE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] who is temporarily absent. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], but as I understand his views on the bill are the same as mine I will take the liberty of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. PALMER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PALMER] is temporarily absent, but he is paired on political questions with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

Mr. RANSOM. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] is paired with my colleague [Mr. VANCE] on party questions.

Mr. CONGER. I said on political questions.

Mr. RANSOM. My colleague is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] on this question.

Mr. CONGER. As I understand it, if my colleague were here he would vote "nay" on this proposition.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CALL. My colleague [Mr. JONES, of Florida] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 26; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUTLER. In line 4 of section 2 I move, after the words "can not," to insert the words "read and;" so as to read:

Being of the age of ten years and over and can not read and write.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator from South Carolina would explain how this would affect the bill as it stands.

Mr. BUTLER. I am utterly unable to answer that question.

Mr. INGALLS. Can the Senator state whether the number of those who can not read and write is greater or less than of those who can not write?

Mr. BUTLER. I can not answer that question, but I should think that a man who can not read would be as illiterate as one who can not write. If you are going at illiteracy, why not include both?

Mr. BLAIR. It will be necessary to adopt a rule to make the computation on the basis either of those who can not read or of those who can not write. The enumerations are different. If those who can not write be adopted as the basis that means something, and the bill can be administered on that basis; but if you put in the language now proposed I do not know that the bill will amount to anything.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that the class of those who can not write is very much larger than the class of those who can not read.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not investigated that question as to whether there are a greater number of those who can not read or of those who can not write, but my off-hand opinion would be that there are a great many who can not read and can not write. A parrot or a monkey might almost write by way of imitation.

Mr. INGALLS. According to the census of 1880 those who could not read were 4,923,451, and those who could not write were 6,239,958, making an excess of those who could not write over those who could not read of about a million and a quarter. Of course those who can not read can not write.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know about that.

Mr. INGALLS. There is no classification which shows that any of those who can not write are included in the class who can not read.

Mr. BUTLER. Why not include both classes?

Mr. INGALLS. I think they ought to be included.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to know of the Senator from South Carolina whether the census tables of 1880, which seem to be the basis of all this calculation, state separately the number of persons who cannot read and write. I find in one of the tables which the honorable chairman introduced the other day a statement of those who can not read and a separate statement of those who can not write. Now is there a table in the census returns of those who can not read and write?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not understand that there is; and the bill should either say those who can not read or those who can not write; and the basis of those who can not write was adopted in the bill. The number who can not write is of course larger. I understand that the census, as the Senator from Kansas stated, shows that the number who can not write is larger than the number of those who can not read. There is not a very substantial difference. The calculations have been made both ways, and it does not make very much difference which basis is adopted. The one that is in the bill has been adopted, and there is no reason for changing it that I can see.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator from South Carolina whether it really makes any difference whether the class which can not write is larger than the class which can not read, because the basis in the section is that whatever number there is of either class in a given State shall be the proportion that it bears to the entire number in the United States. If he makes the provision so that it shall read "the proportion which the whole number of persons in each State, who being of the age of ten years and over can not read and write, bear to the whole number of such persons in the United States," it is simply the proportion in a given State that it bears to the whole. I see no reason why the proportion of persons who can not read and write, for instance, in South Carolina, is not likely to be the same as to all persons in the United States who can not read and write, as the persons who can not read in South Carolina shall bear to the persons who can not read throughout the United States. I do not see that there is anything gained either the one way or the other. It is not a question of the larger class, but of the proportion of the class to the entire number in the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know how that is. I have not examined the census tables, and therefore I frankly say I am not prepared to answer that point; but I think there are many people who can write and can not read—who by a sort of imitation might sign their names and yet not be able to read or even write a syllable or letter. Therefore I think this bill ought to include both classes, and hence I offer the amendment. I have heard no good reason assigned why it should not be adopted. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BLAIR. This is a very important matter. The bill can not be worked if both classes be adopted as the basis. There is absolutely no method of ascertaining so that there can be a practical administration of the law if you include all persons in the country who can not read and write.

This illustrates how important it may be to the friends of the practical operation of this measure if it ever should be enacted to note these numerous amendments and their effect upon this bill. Those who care to see the bill passed and become a law and care to see it efficient may as well give attention to what is going on. The Senator from South Carolina rises and makes a motion the effect of which he says he knows nothing about, pretends not to know, to insert a word which if adopted would throw very great doubt upon the question whether the law can be administered at all. The basis of the distribution of these funds is the census of 1880. That census was taken; and the general ground of division is that of illiteracy. The census shows two classes of illiterates, those who can not read in one table and those who can not write in another table, and the numbers differ largely, as shown by the citation from the census made by the Senator from Kansas.

That being so, it was necessary to adopt either one or the other as the basis of distribution, and it did not make very much difference which, because the relation of those who can not write in any given State or Territory to the whole number of those who can not write in the whole country as shown by the census is a definite mathematical relation, and it is very nearly the same as the relation which exists between the whole number in any given State or Territory who can not read and the whole number in the entire country who can not read. It is a definite mathematical relation, and if that be adopted the bill can be operative. But when you come to inserting the words "read and write," there is no tabulation whatever that you can refer to in order to see how much money is to go to this, that, or the other State. The Senator will find on page 345 one enumeration of those who can not read and another enumeration of those who can not write.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator why can he not ascertain the number of persons in the United States who can not read and write? If you can ascertain how many can not read, why can you not ascertain how many can not both read and write?

Mr. BLAIR. The census has not shown it. There is no mathematical tabulation of it, and there is nothing definite about it. It might be claimed that there were some who could write who were not able to read. A man may be able to write his name and say he writes, but that same man may not be able to read. In various States a man, in order to have the qualifications of a voter—in Massachusetts, for instance—must be able to read. What must he be able to read? In order to be considered able to read in the sense of the Massachusetts law he must be able to read the constitution of Massachusetts or some ordinary book.

The question whether a man can read and write is one of exceedingly dubious nature. There is no settlement of it anywhere, certainly not in the census, and the basis of distribution adopted in the bill is the census of 1880 until another census can be taken.

In view of the confusion it would cause, I can not really think that the Senator should have made this motion without a design.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, while I am up I will offer another amendment. Section 5 provides:

> That the instruction in the common schools wherein these moneys shall be expended shall include the art of reading, writing, and speaking the English language, arithmetic, geography, history of the United States, and such other branches of useful knowledge as may be taught under local laws.

I should like to ask the friends of this bill where they can find, either in the practices or customs of this Government or in the Constitution and laws, any authority for Congress to go into the common schools of the States and dictate what shall be taught there. If that is not taking charge of the schools with a vengeance I should like to know what is; and entertaining the opinion that it does do that, I move to strike out section 5. I do not believe the Congress of the United States has any right whatever to say what shall be taught in the common schools of the respective States.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not know that it is necessary to say anything in opposition to an amendment like that. The bill imposes various restrictions upon the expenditure of this money. It was thought that it should contain something definitely certain as to the character of the instruction to secure which this money should be expended. It says for the benefit of common schools, for the temporary support of common schools; and although one would think the inhabitant of a Northern State might suppose that the expression "common school" was sufficiently definite, yet various persons thought there should be introduced into the bill something to show what a common school is; that it is a place where the ordinary branches of instruction that are essential to common life should be taught. They should be taught at all events, and the money should not gradually by indirection or by innocent intent come to be appropriated to the higher lines of instruction, to the more select schools, to which it might be applied perhaps in some of the States. It was the design that this money should reach the common people through the common schools, that in the common schools the common branches of study should be taught. And, so far from being an interference with the rights of the States, it is no more an interference than any other restriction that is contained in the bill as to the manner in which the money shall be expended.

Mr. BUTLER. I have really no desire to prolong this debate and do not mean to do so, but every Senator who has spoken on this floor in favor of this bill has disclaimed with emphasis, especially my friend from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON], that there was any intention, any purpose to assume any jurisdiction whatever over the common schools of the States; and yet in the fifth section Congress not only assumes jurisdiction but declares in terms what shall be taught in the common schools of the respective States. If that is not taking charge of them, assuming jurisdiction over them, prescribing what shall be done, then I have failed to understand the English language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, which is to strike out section 5. The section will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 5. That the instruction in the common schools wherein these moneys shall be expended shall include the art of reading, writing, and speaking the English language, arithmetic, geography, history of the United States, and such other branches of useful knowledge as may be taught under local laws.

Mr. BUTLER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not understand, as does the Senator from South Carolina, that this section imposes anything upon the States. It only exacts compliance with this provision from them if they intend to receive the benefit of this fund. That is all. If they do not choose to teach these branches in the common schools, of course they are not permitted to avail themselves of this bounty.

Mr. BUTLER. Let me ask the Senator from Iowa this question: Suppose they do not teach these branches after they get the money, what is to be done?

Mr. ALLISON. They do not get the second installment.

Mr. BUTLER. They get the first.

Mr. ALLISON. They would get the first; they would start in with the first installment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It strikes me that if the fifth section is taken from this bill, leaving in it a line that ought to be taken out of the eighth section, it destroys the whole purpose and object of the bill. This is intended to be an appropriation of public money by the Government of the United States for the purpose of promoting a common-school system; and if you take out the fifth section, in my judgment, this money will be carried to the States and distributed among the universities and the colleges, and the common schools will get none of it.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll on Mr. Butler's amendment to strike out section 5.

Mr. MCPHERSON (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GORMAN (when Mr. PIKE'S name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] on all questions connected with this bill.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 8, nays 43; as follows:

YEAS—8.

Beck,	Coke,	Hawley,	Morgan,
Butler,	Harris,	Maxey,	Wilson of Md.

NAYS—43.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Kenna,	Pugh,
Berry,	Eustis,	Logan,	Ransom,
Blackburn,	Evarts,	McMillan,	Riddleberger,
Blair,	Frye,	Mahone,	Sabin,
Brown,	George,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Call,	Gibson,	Miller of N. Y.,	Spooner,
Chace,	Gray,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Teller,
Colquitt,	Hale,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Conger,	Hampton,	Payne,	Walthall,
Cullom,	Jackson,	Platt,	Wilson of Iowa.
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,

ABSENT—25.

Aldrich,	Gorman,	Miller of Cal.,	Stanford,
Bowen,	Harrison,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Vance,
Camden,	Hoar,	Palmer,	Van Wyck,
Cameron,	Ingalls,	Pike,	Vest.
Cockrell,	Jones of Arkansas,	Saulsbury,
Dolph,	Jones of Florida,	Sewell,
Fair,	McPherson,	Sherman,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President, I could not be more earnestly in favor of the measure which this bill proposes to inaugurate than I have been and am. Therefore I hope it will be understood that in offering the amendment which I propose it is in the spirit of friendship.

It will be seen that no money is to be paid under this bill until the governor of a State or Territory has certified as to the school system of the State or Territory and certain other facts, the more important of which is that there is no discrimination by the system between classes. Now it does not seem to me that the Secretary of the Interior will be able to determine whether there exists any discrimination, not only between classes, but between the sections composing the State or Territory upon such a certificate so limited.

Therefore it is that I propose in the amendment which I send to the desk that the governor shall furnish certain information by which not only will the Secretary of the Interior be able to determine as to the proper distribution of the money which it is proposed to contribute by this bill, but that the Congress of the United States may afterward readily perceive whether or not the spirit and purpose of the bill are fully complied with. That is the object, that is the spirit of the amendment which I wish now to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 14, it is proposed to strike out all after "schools" down to and including "schools," in line 15, as follows:

The number of white and the number of colored common schools—

And to insert in lieu thereof:

The number of the population, white and colored, of each school district for each county and city, and the number of children, white and colored, of the school age prescribed by this act in each such district, and the number of each of such class attending school, the number of schools in operation in each such district, white and colored, the number of teachers employed, white and colored, male and female, and the average compensation paid such teachers.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should like to have the words proposed to be inserted read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again report the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Read the entire amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. So as to show how it will read.

The Chief Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, it is read so rapidly that I really do not comprehend it now, but it struck me when first presented as an embodiment in the way of an amendment of the views that you yourself presented on this bill two years ago as to the distribution of this money among school districts so as to discriminate on account of color, whereas the whole object and purpose of the bill is to avoid any discrimination. It just struck me that way. It seems to me that before an amendment of that sort is passed upon at all it ought to be printed and laid on desks of Senators, so that they may have some knowledge of what they are voting upon.

I apprehend that it means—I only apprehend it because I heard a discussion of it here two years ago—that this money shall be apportioned according to the illiteracy which is reported to obtain in certain districts of a State, for instance, without regard to the fundamental idea of the bill. It will be remembered possibly that I opposed that view two years ago. I held then, as I hold now, that the taxes which are levied and paid for the support of the public-school system of the States are mainly paid by the white people. I say that without hesitation. Therefore we ought not to consider so small a matter as a school district. A State like Virginia, for instance, that pays so many hundred thousand dollars for the education of children without regard to race or color, it is known pays it out of the pockets of the people of certain sections of that State.

I do not want to discriminate against the colored man or against any school district, but I do want, if it be possible, to see that there is no discrimination anywhere in this bill.

I am not sure that I am right about this amendment, but it struck me as sounding so much after the manner of the one that the presiding officer himself discussed here two years ago, that I would prefer to have it printed and understand it. I do not want to oppose it unless I do understand it. I do not want to vote for it without knowing what is in it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, asking in the mean time that the amendment of my friend from Virginia be printed.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Vermont also allow me to send two amendments to the desk to have them printed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest that the bill with the amendments already agreed to be reprinted so that we may have it to-morrow morning in its present condition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the bill be reprinted with the amendments that are adopted. Those that are offered will also be printed. If there be no objection that order will be made.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Vermont to allow me to offer an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be printed also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed.

Mr. HAMPTON. I ask the Senator from Vermont to withhold his motion for one moment. I wish to make an explanation. Yesterday when the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] was appealing to Senators on this side to know the action of the Legislature of South Carolina he referred to a memorial, and so did I, sent here in 1883. I did not intend to allude to any action of the present Legislature.

I simply desired to make that correction, as there might be some misunderstanding in reference to the matter.

Mr. EVARTS. I ask leave to send up an amendment intended to be proposed to section 10 of the pending bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received and printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 25 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

The SPEAKER. It is.

POSTAL MONEY-ORDER BUSINESS.

Mr. PETERS (when the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was called). I call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 4415) to make the allowances for clerk-hire to postmasters of the first and second class post-offices cover the cost of clerical labor in the money-order business, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the 1st day of July, 1886, the allowances for clerk-hire made to postmasters of first and second class post-offices by the Postmaster-General out of the annual appropriation for clerks in post-offices shall cover the cost of clerical service of all kinds in such post-offices, including the cost of clerical labor in the money-order business; and that all laws or parts of laws inconsistent or in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That from and after the 1st day of July, 1886, the allowances for clerk-hire in money-order business shall not be separately made, but shall be included in the general allowances for clerk-hire, and shall not be given to post-offices of the first class at the rates specified in the fourth section of the act of March 3, 1883; and from and after the said 1st of July, 1886, compensation for clerical labor in the money-order business shall not be given, at the rates specified in said section, to post-offices of the second class.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

At the end of section 2 strike out the following:

"Shall not be given to post-offices of the first class at the rates specified in the fourth section of the act of March 3, 1883; and from and after the said 1st of July, 1886, compensation for clerical labor in the money-order business shall not be given, at the rates specified in said section, to post-offices of the second class."

And insert the following:

"Shall be based upon, but not to exceed, the rates specified in the fourth section of the act of March 3, 1883; and at all money-order exchange offices which are now or may hereafter be established, additional allowances for clerk-hire may be made as provided in said section for international exchange offices; and postmasters at offices of the first and second classes shall not receive any compensation in addition to their salaries for the transaction of the money-order and postal-note business."

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads at the instance and upon the recommendation of the Postmaster-General. It does not in any manner affect other post-offices than those of the first and second classes. The bill has been carefully examined by the Committee, and unless there are to be some questions asked in relation to it I do not desire to take up time upon it further than to state that it has the recommendation of the Postmaster-General, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, and the Superintendent of the Money-Order Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] will state in a brief way what he understands to be the exact effect of the bill. The amendment is not readily understood upon a hasty reading.

Mr. ROGERS. Before the gentleman from Kansas enters upon his explanation of the bill I desire to make this preliminary inquiry—whether this is the bill reported back as a substitute for bills introduced which proposed to merge the money-order system into the other branches of the postal service?

Mr. PETERS. I will state for the information of the gentleman from Arkansas that this bill covers the same object that was intended to be accomplished by the bill introduced by himself.

Mr. ROGERS. In other words, as I understand, it allows postmasters in first and second class offices to utilize the entire force of their offices without reference to whether a particular officer belongs to the money-order system or to the general postal service.

Mr. PETERS. Yes, that is what this bill accomplishes.

Mr. STRUBLE. I would like to ask a question with reference to the compensation to be paid to these clerks. The bill seems to be very indefinite as to that. It refers to existing laws not set forth in the bill; it provides that these clerks shall not be paid according to a particular law. Now, I would like to know what is to be the law or rule which will govern the compensation to be paid.

Mr. PETERS. Section 4 of the act of March 3, 1883, fixed the rate of compensation for the transaction of money-order business in post-offices, and provided that such compensation should be paid out of the fees received from the issue of money-orders and postal notes. Under that law the late Postmaster-General, Mr. Gresham, decided that a post-office clerk employed for the purpose of attending to money-order business could not devote any of his time to any other duties connected with the post-office.

In other words, he could only attend to the money-order office, and nothing else. As frequently happens, there was not sufficient work in the money-order office to take the time of a clerk in making up and issuing money-orders. It therefore required the postmaster either to do that work himself, or to employ a clerk to do it, whose time thus could not all be devoted to it. So the enforcement of this provision created much embarrassment in post-offices, particularly in smaller post-offices, where the extent of the money-order business was in very many instances not sufficient to occupy the whole time of a clerk, who could not, during any leisure, engage in any other work of the office. This difficulty was removed in part by the following provision inserted in the act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1886, and for other purposes, to wit:

And postmasters are authorized, with the approval of the Postmaster-General, to assign at any time any clerk or employé of their respective post-offices to duty in any branch thereof: Provided, always, That any employé shall be paid from money-order funds for such time as he is engaged in money-order work.

This relieved the difficulty to some extent, but it had this great embarrassment, that the Department could not depend entirely upon the statement of the postmaster as to how much time was occupied in issuing money-orders. The Department absolutely had of itself no criterion upon which to base an estimate except the statement of the postmaster himself. This led to, or rather was, a temptation to the postmaster to increase the amount of time the clerk was employed in the money-order business.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to do away with that temptation and to place the whole matter in the hands of the Postmaster-General, to allow him to state what amount postmasters shall have in first and second class offices. It also gives him a basis upon which to fix that estimate, by stating that he shall fix it on an estimate of 3½ cents for each money-order transaction, 1 cent for each postal note issued, and ¾ of a cent for each postal note paid. So it relieves the Department of that embarrassment, and also relieves the postmaster of any temptation to make the time employed by his clerk in issuing money-orders greater than it naturally would be.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield to me?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, my colleague on the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads has well stated the merits of the pending proposition. It has occurred to me to add one or two thoughts in addition to what he has already said. In the beginning of the money-order system it was merely experimental. It was a novel thing, and there was a disinclination to take hold of it because of its novelty. So with a view to persuade its adoption it was provided the scheme should pay for itself; that the force to be used should be paid out of the money-order fees. The service has gone on and grown until it has become accepted throughout the country.

We find, however, this difficulty attending the administration of the work in post-offices and the distribution of the mails under the money-order system: You allow a gross sum of money to the Postmaster-General to be apportioned among the several post-offices throughout the country for the compensation of clerks in those post-offices. As has been already stated, the Postmaster-General has ruled that the clerk employed for money-order purposes could not be paid out of this fund. Then followed the provision which my friend recites from an appropriation bill, that there should be allowed out of the fund for clerk-hire to the money-order clerk for work done not in connection with the money-order service, but for clerical services in addition to that service.

But, as was stated by my friend, there was this difficulty: Take the postmaster at an important point; take for instance the postmaster at the city of Washington or at the city of New Orleans. There must be a roster made up for the distribution of the fund. Take the money-order clerks at those offices. They may be used one day so many hours for money-order business, and on the same day so many hours in the distribution of the mails. To-morrow they may be used at different times. Hence there is almost an utter impossibility for the postmaster to make out a roster showing the amount of time these clerks were used in the money-order business and the amount of time they were used in the distribution of the mails.

The principal purpose, therefore, of this bill is to avoid that confusion by allowing postmasters a gross sum which may be used in the money-order business or for the distribution of the mails. This is the whole story; it merely simplifies the matter, and there will be no further pay or expense because of it.

Mr. ROGERS. I examined this subject at one time and favored the purport of the pending measure. My memory is indistinct as to one provision of the law, and that is how it distinguishes between first, second, and third class postmasters. Following that, I would like to know whether it is not necessary to extend the provisions of this bill to third-class post-offices?

Mr. BLOUNT. I confess I do not see any objection myself to making it applicable generally to the third or even to the fourth in some cases.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If the gentleman from Georgia will permit me a moment, I think I can answer the question of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The third-class post-offices do not have clerks assigned to them, nor the fourth-class offices, for this purpose.

Mr. ROGERS. But they are money-order offices, are they not?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. They may do a money-order business, of course; nearly all third-class offices do; but they do not have postal clerks assigned to them. They must furnish the clerical force out of the salary allowed to the postmaster.

Mr. LONG. There is no allowance for clerk-hire in third-class offices now?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There is not.

Mr. PETERS. Postmasters at third or fourth class offices are allowed clerk-hire for distribution purposes, but not for the money-order business.

Mr. ROGERS. What is the distinction between these classes? How do you determine a third-class postmaster?

Mr. PETERS. The difference between second and third class postmasters is regulated by the salary received.

Mr. ROGERS. What is the salary of a third-class postmaster?

Mr. PETERS. It is over $1,000 and less than $2,000.

Mr. ROGERS. Allow me to ask the gentleman from Kansas further if he is quite sure that the same rule has not been applied to third-class offices that has been applied to the second-class offices with reference to the money-order business?

Mr. PETERS. If I understand the question of the gentleman, I think the rule has not been applied to third-class offices.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Not for this purpose.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman from Kansas permit me a moment?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. DOCKERY. Clerk-hire is only allowed to postmasters of the third class for separating purposes.

Mr. PETERS. Yes; for distribution.

Mr. DOCKERY. This allowance is a very inconsiderable item; but while it does not compensate the clerk for the labor performed, it is a small addendum to his pay. For instance, a postmaster who gets $1,000 a year is allowed, say, $160 for clerk-hire by reason of separating, star-routes, or railway crossing.

Mr. ROGERS. Then there are no money-order clerks allowed to third-class offices?

Mr. DOCKERY. No, sir.

Mr. ROGERS. I have no further inquiry to make, Mr. Speaker. I believe the bill to be a very good and wise one. It is satisfactory to me.

Mr. PETERS. I move the previous question, unless some gentleman desires to ask further questions upon the amendment to the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is proposed by the committee to strike out after the word "and," in the fourth line of the bill, the following words:

"Shall not be given to post-offices of the first class at the rates specified in the fourth section of the act of March 3, 1883; and from and after the said 1st of July, 1886, compensation for clerical labor in the money-order business shall not be given, at the rates specified in said section, to post-offices of the second class."

And insert in lieu thereof:

Shall be based upon, but not to exceed, the rates specified in the fourth section of the act of March 3, 1883; and at all money-order exchange offices which are now or may hereafter be established, additional allowances for clerk-hire may be made as provided in said section for international exchange offices; and postmasters at offices of the first and second classes shall not receive any compensation in addition to their salaries for the transaction of the money-order and postal-note business.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PETERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FEE ON DOMESTIC MONEY-ORDERS.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 4177) to reduce the fee on domestic money-orders for sums not exceeding $5. This bill is on the House Calendar.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the fee for each domestic money-order not exceeding in amount $5 shall be reduced from 8 cents to 5 cents.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect within one month after the date of its approval by the President.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This bill simply reduces the fee on money-orders under $5 from 8 cents to 5 cents. It may be said in explanation that the net revenue from the money-order business amounted last year to one hundred and twenty-three thousand some odd hundred dollars over and above all expenses, including clerk-hire in Washington, rent of buildings, and other incidental expenses. This reduction therefore to 5 cents can be made and still leave, unless reductions are made otherwise, a surplus arising out of the business. It is recommended by the Postmaster-General, and has the unanimous support of the committee. I do not know that it is necessary to say anything further, unless some gentleman desires to ask a question in reference to it.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio whether or not the terms of the bill—I did not hear the reading of it—make it applicable to offices of all grades?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. To all money-order offices. This applies only to money-orders below $5, the fee on which is now 8 cents.

Mr. ROGERS. Let me ask the gentleman further whether or not the committee considered the proposition as to whether the third and fourth class offices were sufficiently paid under the present arrangement.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. This has nothing to do with the pay of clerks. It simply reduces the fee now paid on these money-orders.

Mr. ROGERS. But does not that fee form a portion of the salary of the office?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is so much on each order; and this bill does not change that.

Mr. ROGERS. But does not that necessarily reduce the compensation of the third-class postmasters?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No; they are not paid by a percentage on the amount, but so much on the orders issued.

Mr. ROGERS. Then it does not affect their compensation.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The bill does not change the fees in any way. The fees of postmasters are so much for each order. I think there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to HOMESTEAD SETTLERS WITHIN RAILWAY LIMITS.

The Committee on the Public Lands was called.

Mr. McRAE called up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 129) to protect homestead settlers within railway limits, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all homestead settlers on public lands within the railway limits restricted to less than 160 acres of land, who have heretofore made or may hereafter make the additional entry allowed either by the act approved March 3, 1879, or the act approved July 1, 1879, after having made final proof of settlement and cultivation under the original entry, shall be entitled to have the lands covered by the additional entry patented without any further cost or proof of settlement and cultivation; and in all such entries patents shall issue as soon as reported to and approved by the General Land Commissioner.

SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, this bill only affects such homestead settlers as are embraced within the limits of railroads that have received grants from the General Government. Under the acts of March 3 and July 1, 1879, settlers within those limits who were restricted to 80 acres had their rights extended to 160; but the provisos to those acts require an additional year's residence and cultivation—six years instead of five, as in other cases.

The Committee on the Public Lands have recommended the passage of this bill. It simply gives these settlers the benefits of the additional rights granted by these acts without additional cost or expense, as was evidently intended by the first acts.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the bill will be reported again.

The bill was again read.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McRAE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC LAND-GRANTS.

Mr. COBB, on behalf of the Committee on the Public Lands, called up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 453) to forfeit the lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes, with amendments.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all the lands, excepting the right of way and lands for stations, heretofore granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company by an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast," approved July 27, 1866, and subsequent acts and joint resolutions of Congress, which are adjacent to and conterminous with the uncompleted portions of the main line of said road, embraced within both the granted and indemnity limits, as contemplated to be constructed under and by the provisions of the said act of July 27, 1866, and acts and joint resolutions subsequent thereto and relating to the construction of said road and telegraph, be, and the same are hereby, declared forfeited and restored to the public domain, and made subject to disposal under the general laws of the United States as though said grant had never been made: Provided, That the price of the lands so forfeited and restored shall be the same as heretofore fixed for the even-numbered sections within said grant.

SEC. 2. That the act of March 3, 1875, entitled "An act for the relief of settlers within railroad limits," is hereby repealed.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In line 3 of section 1, after the words "right of way," strike out the words "and lands for stations."

In lines 20 and 21, strike out the words "the same as heretofore fixed for the even-numbered sections within said grant," and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

"One dollar and twenty-five cents per acre: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be held to impair any right the United States may have in or to the lands not forfeited by this act."

Strike out section 2, which is as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the act of March 3, 1875, entitled 'An act for the relief of settlers within railroad limits,' is hereby repealed."

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that passed the last Congress, and I do not desire to take up the time of the House in discussing it unless gentlemen desire to have that done. The majority of the Committee on Public Lands report a bill forfeiting all the lands that are not conterminous with the completed road. There is a minority report accompanying the majority report which favors a bill providing for the forfeiture of the entire grant.

This road was chartered in 1866 by an act of Congress and a grant of lands was made to it. The road begins, or did begin, at Springfield, Mo., and ran upon the latitude of 35° north to the Pacific Ocean. The road was not completed within the time. There really were but 34 miles of road completed within the time, and since that time there have been about 60 miles of the road completed, and the company have purchased another line of road which they claim as a part of this line. But it is not really upon the line of the road, as indicated by the act of Congress making the grant. The company, therefore, has totally failed to comply with its contract with the Government, and the Committee on the Public Lands is of the opinion that a forfeiture ought to be had.

The only reason why the entire grant is not forfeitable in the opinion of the majority of the committee is founded on the act of Congress of 1871. That act gave the company the power to mortgage its road. Perhaps it had that before, but the act gave the company that right, and gave—as the majority of the committee believe the true construction to be—a lien upon the lands that were conterminous with the completed road at the time of forfeiture. There is some controversy, however, about the construction of that act. The minority of the committee are of the opinion that the entire grant is subject to forfeiture. The majority of the committee think otherwise. The only controversy is as to whether we will forfeit the lands conterminous with the non-completed road, or whether we will forfeit the entire grant. Were it not for this act that I have referred to there would be no question about the forfeiture of the entire grant.

This company, in my judgment, from the very best information that I can gather, has really never completed but 34 miles of its road. I said a moment ago that about 60 miles had been completed in addition to that; but that was done by the Saint Louis and San Francisco company. And I believe that to-day the Atlantic and Pacific Railway Company is a mere shell, a mere formality, and that there is no substance in it as is set out in the report; that the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé and the Saint Louis and San Francisco companies own and control its capital stock. In my judgment, from the best information I can obtain, they own and control not only the road-bed that is completed but the rolling-stock that is upon it, together with its entire machinery; and whatever benefit may result from this grant will not go to the original corporation for which it was intended, but will go to foreign corporations which had no connection or relation whatever with the contract. The report is pretty long, and as it sets out all the facts, I shall not take up the time of the House in discussing the matter further unless some member desires additional information. If anybody does desire that, I shall take great pleasure in answering any questions that may be put; otherwise I shall now give way.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute for the pending bill, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to forfeit the lands granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast and to restore the same to settlement, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That all the lands, excepting the right of way, heretofore granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company by an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast," approved July 27, 1866, and subsequent acts and joint resolutions of Congress be, and the same are hereby, declared forfeited and restored to the public domain, and made subject to disposal under the general homestead laws of the United States as though said grant had never been made: Provided, This act of forfeiture shall not affect the rights of those claiming under any mortgage made by the said company by virtue of the act approved April 20, 1871, to so much of the lands granted conterminous with or appertaining to that part of said road which was actually constructed by the company by the 4th day of July, 1878.

SEC. 2. That all persons who at the date of the passage of this act are actual settlers in good faith on any of the lands hereby forfeited, and who are otherwise qualified, on making due claim to such lands under the homestead, pre-emption, or other laws, within six months after the same shall have been declared forfeited, shall be entitled to a preference right to enter the same in accordance with the provisions of this act and of the homestead, pre-emption, or other laws, as the case may be, and shall be regarded as having legally settled upon and occupied said lands under said laws from the date of such actual settlement or occupation; and in case any such settler may not be entitled to thus enter or acquire such land under existing laws, he or she shall be permitted, within one year after the passage of this act, to purchase not to exceed 160 acres of the same, at the price of $1.25 per acre; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to make such rules and regulations as will secure to said actual settlers the benefit of their rights under this act: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to affect the title to any city, town, or village site where the same has passed to patent and been sold by the company.

SEC. 3. That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to institute proper legal proceedings to set aside and cancel any mortgage or mortgages that may have been executed by said company upon lands forfeited by this act.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, the majority of the committee report in favor of forfeiting all the lands not conterminous with the constructed part of the road. The facts as reported by the majority are, I believe, correctly stated, and from that report we learn that, within the time fixed by the granting act for the completion of this road, only 34 miles of it were completed. Up to this time only about 100 miles have been built, yet this company claim a grant extending over 2,000 miles. I believe that the whole of this land grant ought to be forfeited. The reasoning of the majority of the committee shows conclusively that we have the power to forfeit the grant, and it appears to me that there is no equity at all on the part of this company. The only justification the majority offer for insisting that all of this grant shall not be forfeited is the act of April 20, 1871, the act authorizing the company to mortgage its road, which I now ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHAP. XXXIII.—An act to enable the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company to mortgage its road.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, organized under act of Congress of July 27, 1866, is hereby authorized to make and issue its bonds in such form and manner, and for such sums, payable at such times, and bearing such rate of interest, and to dispose of them on such terms as its directors may deem advisable; and to secure said bonds, the said company may mortgage its road, equipment, lands, franchises, privileges, and other rights and property, subject to such terms, conditions, and limitations as its directors may prescribe. As proof and notice of the legal execution and effectual delivery of any mortgage hereafter made by said company, it shall be filed and recorded in the office of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That if the company shall hereafter suffer any breach of the conditions of the act above referred to, under which it is organized, the rights of those claiming under any mortgage made by the company to the lands granted to it by said act shall extend only to so much thereof as shall be coterminous with or appertaining to that portion of said road which shall have been constructed at the time of the foreclosure of said mortgage.

Mr. McRAE. Now, Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that a proper construction of the language of that act will not extend the privileges of this company beyond the time fixed by the granting act. It was passed before the expiration of the time for the building of the road, and its only purpose was to give the company power to mortgage such rights as it had. There was no intention and no attempt to extend the time for the completion of it, nor to grant any other privilege except the power to execute a mortgage.

It is insisted now that all the lands covered by this grant will be covered by the mortgage up to the time of foreclosure; but as the power to foreclose rests in the hands of the people who hold the mortgage, it may—no doubt will be postponed for all time, and in that case the rights of the Government can never be protected.

Now, I insist that under this act the lien of the mortgagees has attached to the 34 miles of road completed within the prescribed time. The act did not contemplate extending the time, and it was the duty of the mortgagees to foreclose the mortgage at that time if they were going to insist upon holding the lands of the Government which were granted upon the conditions set forth in the granting act. So I insist that this substitute should be adopted, which will in effect restore to the public domain all the lands granted to this company except the 34 miles of road which was completed within the time. While but for this act Congress would have the power to forfeit that also, I concede that the act fixes a lien in favor of the mortgagees upon that portion of the road which was completed within the time, but that the lien extends no further.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the House will vote to adopt the substitute, and thus restore this immense body of land to the settlers in the country through which the road runs. By a system of ingenious trading this company has bought other roads, and claims that it has earned this immense grant of land, amounting to nearly 51,000,000 acres—earned it by the construction of about 100 miles of road! It is a case that calls more loudly for forfeiture than any other case within my knowledge. If you want to do justice to the people along the line of the road and to the States through which it runs, adopt this substitute. It provides as far as possible for the protection of the settlers along the line, and it does no injustice to the mortgagees so far as the portion of the road completed within the prescribed time is concerned. In the third section there is a provision authorizing the Attorney-General to institute a suit to adjust the rights of the mortgagees and the United States, which I believe should be done. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that have nothing further to say at present on this bill.

Mr. OATES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. McRAE. Yes, sir.

Mr. OATES. I would like the gentleman to state the effect of the proviso in the act of April 20, 1871, especially the latter portion, which provides that the rights of those claiming under the mortgage shall be determined at the time of the foreclosure; that said mortgage shall rest upon the lands conterminous with the constructed road at the time of the foreclosure of said mortgage.

Mr. McRAE. My opinion about that act is that some man interested in the railroad company drew it for the purpose of getting an undue advantage of the Government. But the act, taken altogether, including its title, indicates very clearly that it was not the intention of Congress to extend the time for building this road until the mortgage should be foreclosed. In terms the act does not extend the time at all. It only gave the power, which these parties denied they had, to mortgage the land; and if they failed to build within the prescribed time, it gave them only the right to land conterminous with the portion of the road constructed within that time. The act granted no additional time; and a fair and just construction of it will not give the company any lands not conterminous with the portion of the line constructed within the time.

Mr. Speaker, if a vote can be had on this matter to-day, I do not desire to say anything further. Otherwise I would like to reserve my time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit an amendment to the original bill. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out after the words "to disposal," in lines 17 and 18, and insert, "to entry and settlement under the provisions of the homestead law by actual settlers only, as though said grant had never been made: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be held to impair any right the United States may have in or to the lands embraced in said grant not declared forfeited by this act."

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say but a single word——

Mr. COBB. I desire to reserve a point of order on that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] reserves a point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The hour has expired, and under special order of the House the remainder of the day will be devoted to the consideration of the Fitz-John Porter bill.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, for the consideration of the special order, the bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

Mr. LAIRD addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BRAGG. I would like to inquire as to the allotment of time. About how much has been occupied on each side?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will answer the gentleman that according to the way the Chair has kept the count about five hours have been occupied in favor of the bill and six hours and forty minutes against it. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] is recognized.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, the measure before the committee is identical in all its features with an act passed in the Forty-eighth Congress for the relief of Fitz-John Porter. That act, however, did not become a law for the reason that it could not command Executive approval. On the 21st of July, 1884, President Arthur returned the bill to the House with his veto; which was as follows:

It is apparent that should this bill become a law it will create a new office which can be filled by the appointment of the particular individual whom it specifies, and can not be filled otherwise; or it may be said with perhaps greater precision of statement that it will create a new office upon condition that the particular person designated shall be chosen to fill it.

Such an act, as it seems to me, is either unnecessary and ineffective or it involves an encroachment by the legislative branch of the Government upon the authority of the Executive. As the Congress has no power under the Constitution to nominate or appoint an officer and can not lawfully impose upon the President the duty of nominating or appointing to office any particular individual of its own selection, this bill, if it can fairly be construed as requiring the President to make the nomination, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate the appointment which it authorizes, is in manifest violation of the Constitution. If such be not its just interpretation it must be regarded as a mere enactment of advice and counsel, which lacks in the very nature of things the force of positive law and can serve no useful purpose upon the statute-books.

There are other causes that deter me from giving this bill the sanction of my approval. The judgment of the court-martial by which more than twenty years since General Fitz-John Porter was tried and convicted was pronounced by a tribunal composed of nine general officers of distinguished character and ability. Its investigation of the charges by which it found the accused guilty was thorough and conscientious, and its findings and sentence were in due course of law approved by Abraham Lincoln, then President of the United States.

Its legal competency, its jurisdiction of the accused and of the subject of the accusation, and the substantial regularity of all its proceedings, are matters which have never been brought in question.

Its judgment, therefore, is final and conclusive in its character.

The Supreme Court of the United States has recently declared that a court-martial such as this was is the organism provided by law and clothed with the duty of administering justice in this class of cases.

Its judgments, when approved, rest on the same basis and are surrounded by the same considerations which give conclusiveness to the judgments of other legal tribunals, including as well the lowest as the highest. It follows accordingly that when a lawfully constituted court-martial has duly declared its findings, and its sentence, and the same have been duly approved, neither the President nor the Congress has any power to set them aside.

The existence of such power is not openly asserted, nor perhaps is it necessarily implied, in the provisions of the bill which is before me; but when its enacting clauses are read in the light of recitations of its preamble it will be seen that it seeks in effect the practical annulment of the findings and the sentence of a competent court-martial.

This veto presents a new phase in this case. The Committee on Military Affairs dispose of it in three lines, as follows:

Your committee have carefully considered the objections returned by the President to the bill, and are clearly of the opinion that they are not well founded, and should not interrupt the course of justice.

It is unfortunate that the Committee on Military Affairs did not furnish the House with the reasons which led it to this conclusion. This committee was appointed January 7, 1886, and reported January 19, twelve days thereafter. The meetings of the committee could not have been numerous, nor the examination of the constitutional question very searching. The questions raised by the veto of President Arthur are too momentous to be thus flippantly cast aside, too far-reaching to be wholly ignored, and I conjure the majority of this House before passing this measure to see to it that it is not only in harmony with the sentiment of the American people but consonant with the Constitution of the United States, to the support of which we all stand most solemnly bound.

A full examination of this measure involves the consideration of two propositions: first, the constitutional power of Congress to do what this bill proposes; and, secondly, if the power exists, the propriety of exercising it. If it shall appear from an examination of the first proposition that to pass this measure is to trample upon and violate the plainest principle of the Constitution and unbalance the three great powers by which the harmony and perpetuity of our governmental system would be seriously impaired and ultimately destroyed, then that is the end of this controversy, and the consideration of the second proposition becomes wholly immaterial. Believing as I do that the provisions of this bill are repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, I shall content myself with the discussion chiefly of this phase of the case.

What is the case, then, with which this bill proposes to deal? On the 10th day of January, 1863, Fitz-John Porter, by the judgment of a court-martial, was found guilty of—first, "disobedience of the lawful commands of his superior officer," and, secondly, "misbehavior in the face of the enemy." Whereupon he was cashiered and dismissed from the military service of the United States and forever disqualified from holding any office of profit or trust under the Government thereof. On the 21st day of January, 1863, Abraham Lincoln approved the findings of the court in the following terms:

JANUARY 21, 1863.

The foregoing proceedings, findings, and sentence in the foregoing case of Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter are approved and confirmed, and it is ordered that the said Fitz-John Porter be, and he hereby is, cashiered and dismissed from the service of the United States as a major-general of volunteers, and as colonel and brevet brigadier-general in the regular service of the United States, and forever disqualified from holding any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

From the moment that judgment was approved by President Lincoln, and by virtue of it, Porter ceased to be an officer of the United States. It is now proposed that Congress put him back in defiance of the judgment of this court-martial. This presents the vital question in the case. Where is the revisory power over the decisions of courts-martial lodged? If in Congress, then we have power to do this thing. If not, we can not do it. It will not be contended, I apprehend, that in so far as this bill attempts to exercise the pardoning power but that it is a bald usurpation of executive authority conferred by that provision of the Constitution which lodges with the President the power of granting reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States. In so far as the bill attempts to exercise the appointing power it is a flagrant infringement of the prerogatives both of the President and the Senate, upon whose joint action the Constitution has conferred the sole authority of appointment. This bill seeks to clothe the Executive with power to appoint Fitz-John Porter in defiance of the judgment of a court-martial.

That judgment removed him; this act restores him. By authority of the court-martial he was dismissed; by authority of Congress he is restored. The effect of this bill is nothing more nor less than to override, set aside, and nullify the findings and sentence of that court-martial. If it does not do that it furnishes no relief whatever. But such is its avowed purpose and effect, and presents a vital legal question in the case. Where, then, is the revisory power over the decisions of courts-martial lodged? Does the Constitution of the United States confer upon Congress the power to set aside, modify, and annul the sentence of a general court-martial? If it does, we can pass this measure. If it does not, we can not. I affirm and shall undertake to demonstrate the truth of the proposition that the findings of a court-martial, when legally constituted and duly organized, having jurisdiction of the person and the subject-matter, supplemented by the approval of the proper revisory power, are as conclusive and binding as the judgments of any civil court of original jurisdiction, and that Congress has no power to set aside, modify, or annul them, and that the only escape for the party resting under the condemnation of such a tribunal is through the broad avenue of the pardoning power, guarded only, except in cases of impeachment, by Executive discretion.

In discussing whether Congress has the revisory power over the decisions of courts-martial a better understanding will be reached by tracing this power from its source to its final lodgment in our Constitution. Previous to the separation of the colonies from the mother country we have no difficulty in determining where the revisory power over the findings of courts-martial was lodged. The seventy-ninth section of the mutiny act of England, in force at the time the American colonies declared their independence, expressly authorized an appeal from the sentence of a court-martial to the court of king's bench and common pleas. Under this revisory power it was repeatedly held that the appellate court could not only arrest the judgment of a court-martial, but was empowered to order a new trial. After the colonies severed their connection with England their first care was to raise, organize, and discipline an army, and in furtherance of which purpose the Continental Congress, exercising not only executive and legislative but judicial powers, proceeded to establish rules and articles of war. By the eighteenth section of the rules and articles of war it was provided:

That the continental general commanding in either of the American States for the time being shall have full power of appointing general courts-martial to be held, and of pardoning and mitigating any punishment ordered to be inflicted for any of the offenses mentioned in the aforementioned rules and articles for the better government of the troops, except the punishment of offenders under the sentence of death by a general court-martial, which he may order to be suspended until the pleasure of Congress can be known; which suspension, with the proceedings of the court-martial, he shall immediately transmit to Congress for their determination. (1 Graydon's Digest, appendix, 156–157.)

Under this section of the Articles of War for the government of the Continental Army it is clear that the Continental Congress so far assumed the exercise of judicial power in this regard as to make itself the revisory tribunal, in some cases, over the findings of courts-martial. A brief experience, however, was sufficient to demonstrate how utterly impossible it was to maintain discipline in the Army if the judgments of a court-martial were to be revised and annulled by a political body like the American Congress; and so, in 1777, the whole revisory power was, by express enactment of law, conferred upon the General or Commander-in-Chief of the Continental Army. Here it remained until the close of the Revolutionary war, when, on the 31st of May, 1786, it was resolved by Congress that—

No sentence of a general court-martial, in time of peace, extending to the loss of life, the dismission of a commissioned officer, or which shall, either in time of peace or war, respect a general officer, shall be carried into execution, until after the whole proceedings shall have been transmitted to the Secretary of War, to be laid before Congress for their confirmation or disapproval, and their orders in the same. (1 Graydon, App., 158-9.)

Here we find the Continental Congress, in peace, assuming the revisory power over the decisions of courts-martial to the extent not only of confirming or disapproving its findings but to making such orders in the same as its judgment might dictate. Its powers were unquestioned and supreme and ample to accomplish what this bill proposes.

In 1818 Attorney-General Wirt, speaking of the extent of the power conferred upon the Continental Congress by the act of 1786, said:

I can not doubt that it was the intention of Congress to lodge in that body all the conciliating powers over sentences of courts-martial which they must have known to exist in the different branches of the Government of England.

He further says:

The Continental Congress was forced by the emergency of the crisis to assume in some instances legislative, executive, and judicial power to take care of the Republic, in relation to the Army particularly. That they (the Continental Congress) could have done all which the court of king's bench could have done for the relief of the injured honor of the Army I have no doubt. (1 Opinions, 237-8.)

Previous, then, to the establishment of our present form of government we have no difficulty in ascertaining where the revisory power over the decisions of courts-martial was lodged, and the extent to which that power might be exercised. We shall have quite as little embarrassment, I apprehend, in determining the repository of this power and the limit of its exercise under the Federal Constitution. When the fathers took down the unseemly structure of the confederacy and reared the present fabric of civil government they divided it into three compartments, the legislative, the executive, and the judicial, each distinct, together forming one symmetrical whole.

To the legislative department it assigned one class of duties, to the executive another, and to the judicial another. Among the powers conferred upon the legislative department by section 8, article I of the Constitution are the following, namely:

To declare war.
To raise armies.
To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.
To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia; and for governing such parts of them as may be employed in the service of the United States.

The power to declare war, so essential to the preservation of our Government, was not only especially conferred upon Congress by the Constitution, but ample provision was made for making that power effective.

To declare war would be brutum fulmen unless supplemented with the power to raise armies, and marching armies without government or discipline would overthrow the liberties of the people which they were marshalled to defend; hence Congress was enjoined by the express letter of the Constitution "to make rules for the regulation and government of the land and naval forces." Then, as if to place the matter beyond all cavil, it was further provided in the same article that "Congress shall make all laws that may be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers."

It is in the execution of this authority that Congress has provided and established articles of war for the regulation and government of the land and naval forces of the United States. But rules and regulations for the government of the Army would be of little avail without the power to enforce them, and it is for the purpose of their enforcement that Congress has authorized courts-martial to try and punish offenders of military law. Whiting, in his work on the War Powers of the United States, well says:

Congress has power to provide means as well as rules for governing the Army. In the execution of this authority Congress has provided for governing the Army by erecting military courts, which are not merely necessary and proper, but are the only practical means yet found for carrying into execution the rules and regulations so enacted. Such courts are, therefore, sanctioned as positively as if established by express language in the Constitution.

The authority conferred upon Congress to establish courts-martial is further recognized in the fifth amendment to the Constitution, which provides that—

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces.

Justice Swayne, speaking of this provision of the Constitution (in the case of Dynes vs. Hoover, 20 Howard), says:

These provisions show that Congress has the power to provide for the trial and punishment of military and naval offenses in the manner then and now practiced by civilized nations; and that the power to do so is given without any connection between it and the third article of the Constitution defining the judicial power of the United States; indeed, that the two powers are entirely independent of each other.

It thus appearing that Congress is clothed with power under the Constitution to establish courts-martial, it remains to be seen what, if any, provision has been made for a revision of its findings, and if such provision has been made, where that power resides. In the first place it will not be contended that this revisory power is conferred upon Congress or the judiciary by any express language of the Constitution or any statutory enactment. If such power resides in either of the departments it must be by implication. Unfortunately, however, for such a view of the case, it is expressly provided how and by whom the revisory power shall be exercised.

The thirtieth article of war provides for an appeal from a regimental to a general court-martial.

By the seventy-second article of war "the proceedings and sentence shall be laid before the President for his approval or orders in the case"—a power as broad as that exercised by the Continental Congress under the act of 1786.

By the one hundred and fourth article it is provided "that no sentence of a court-martial shall be carried into execution until the whole proceedings shall have been approved by the officer ordering the court."

By the one hundred and fifth article "the sentence of a court-martial inflicting the punishment of death shall not be carried into execution until it shall have been confirmed by the President."

The one hundred and sixth article provides for a revision by the President.

The one hundred and eighth article I will give in full, as it is the one under which the President acted in this case:

No sentence of a court-martial, either in time of peace or in time of war, respecting a general officer, shall be carried into execution until it shall be confirmed by the President.

In the light of these provisions I do not see how it can be questioned but that the President in this case has the sole revisory power, and that this attempt on the part of Congress to reopen and readjudicate the matter is a bold and flagrant usurpation which, if persisted in in all cases, would certainly prove destructive of all military order and discipline.

In this connection, bearing upon the power of the President over the findings of courts-martial, I desire to quote an opinion of Attorney-General Wirt directly in point.

In 1818 Attorney-General Wirt said:

The power which Congress possessed before the formation of the present Government was obviously intended to be transferred to the President after its formation. (1 Opinions, 238.)

In 1829 Attorney-General Berrien, giving an opinion upon the same subject, said:

The power now exercised by the President is the same which, in the early history of our Government, was exercised by the Commander-in-Chief or by Congress. When it is considered that he is, by the Constitution, the depositary of the pardoning power, that this is co-extensive with every species of punishment, except only in cases of impeachment, it can not, I think, be doubted that he has authority to mitigate, as well as to confirm or reject the sentence of a general court-martial in the exercise of the supervisory power committed to him by the act for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States. (2 Opinions, 289.)

It seems to me, therefore, that it can not be questioned either in reason or upon authority, but that the President of the United States, in cases of this character, is clothed with all the powers to affirm or disapprove, revise or modify, the findings of courts-martial, which were possessed by the Continental Congress previous to the adoption of the Federal Constitution. The only remaining question is whether Congress has the constitutional power to revise the revision of the President; whether executive determination, enjoined by law, is final and conclusive, or whether it is open to the everlasting bickerings of a political body like the American Congress. Everlasting, I say, for if this doctrine is established there is and can be no end.

Fortunately, however, in the consideration of this question we are not compelled to grope our way over uncertain ground and beneath unlighted skies, but we walk in beaten paths illumined by the clear light of judicial learning, and here I prefer to follow in the footsteps of others without attempting to direct the way. Lieutenant Whitney, of the Marine Corps, was tried, convicted, and cashiered by a court-martial He applied to the Secretary of the Navy for restoration. The Secretary of the Navy, Hon. David Henshaw, submitted the question of his power in the premises to Attorney-General Nelson, and, in reply, the Attorney-General said:

The case of Lieutenant Whitney has heretofore engaged the attention of Mr. Crittenden, late Attorney-General, who stated the results of his examination. In those opinions I entirely concur as far as they relate to the character and validity of the proceedings of the court and to the harshness of the sentence pronounced by that tribunal. But I know of no revisory power by which that sentence can now be rescinded, annulled, or modified. It has been passed upon by the competent authority from whose decision the law has provided no appeal. It must therefore forever stand as the judgment of the court. The effect of the judgment, it is true, may be removed; not, however, in virtue of any authority to reverse the court's sentence, but in the exercise of the power of appointment with which the Constitution has clothed the President. No case has been brought to my notice in which an officer once dismissed has ever been restored to the service otherwise than by nomination by the Chief Magistrate and confirmation by the Senate, where the grade of the appointment was within the control of their joint action; and if such a case had occurred, I should not hesitate to declare it to be in direct repugnance to the Constitution and the laws and to every principle applicable to their just and safe construction.

The proceedings of the court held in this case I do not deem it necessary to discuss. I have no difficulty, however, in stating that they were exceedingly irregular. But still I do not perceive how those irregularities can be regarded as annulling the judgment pronounced. They might have been appealed to as reasons why the revisory power, when called to act upon the proceedings, should not have approved the finding and sentence of the court; but that approval having been signified, they can not avail wholly to avoid everything that has been done. The judgment of the tribunals created by the law has been pronounced and carried into effect, and the officer upon whom it operates was thenceforth unquestionably out of the service. The judgment I hold now to be irreversible. If he is restored to the service, it must be through the power of appointment, which the President will exercise according to his own sense of the exigency of the case. (4 Opinions, 274.)

In the case of Commodore Barron's trial by court-martial it was sought to vitiate the proceedings upon the ground of their irreguiarity, and the Secretary of the Navy propounded two questions to the Attorney-General, the second one of which was, "What relief can now be given?" and in 1843 Attorney-General Legaré said:

I hold it to be quite unnecessary to consider the first point, because my opinion is very decided on the second. Commodore Barron was tried by a competent court. Its sentence was approved by the President at the time. It is too much to ask, after the whole generation who were concerned in these proceedings have passed away, that a solemn judicial sentence thus pronounced, thus ratified, thus acquiesced in should be set aside as a mere nullity. If this precedent were set the Navy Department and this office would be turned into a permanent court of errors, to try over all the cases disposed of since the foundation of the Government; for if thirty-five years be no bar, what is? and if you can set aside a judgment of your predecessors why shall not any of your successors for fifty years to come set aside yours? The repose of society and the putting an end to controversy and litigation are more desirable than mere accuracy of procedure or even the justice of a particular case. (4 Opinions, 171.)]

In 1854 Attorney-General Cushing had occasion to give an opinion on the same subject, and, after quoting with approval the decisions of Legaré, Crittenden, and others, said:

It is impossible, it seems to me, to deny the soundness of these conclusions of my predecessors. I defer to them as precedents, and they have the approbation of my judgment. The decision of the President of the United States in cases of this sort is that of the ultimate judge provided by the Constitution and laws. Like that of any other court in the last resort of law, it is final as to the subject, matter. (7 Opinions.)

In 1861 Attorney-General Bates, in a case submitted to him by President Lincoln, said that—

It is beyond the power of the President to annul or revoke the sentence of a court-martial which has been approved and executed under a former President is well settled.

Then, after quoting with approval the decisions of former Attorneys-General, he concludes:

I know of no redress which is open to him except an appeal to the pardoning power. (10 Opinions, 64.)

In 1864 Attorney-General Bates again had occasion to express an opinion upon this question, and in doing so used the following language:

Undoubtedly the President, in passing upon the sentence of a court-martial, and giving to it the approval without which it cannot be executed, acts judicially. The whole proceeding from its inception is judicial. The trial, finding, and sentence are solemn acts of a court organized and conducted under the authority and according to the prescribed forms of law. It sits to pass upon the most sacred questions of human rights that are ever placed on trial in a court of justice. When the President, then, performs this duty of approving the sentence of a court-martial dismissing an officer, his act has all the solemnity and significance of the judgment of a court of law. As it has to be performed under the same sanctions, so it draws with it the same consequences. One of these consequences is, that where a judgment has been regularly entered in a case properly within the judicial cognizance, from which no appeal has been provided, and it has been followed by execution, it is final and conclusive upon the party against whom it is entered. And this effect attaches, in my opinion, to the action of the President in approving the sentence of a court-martial dismissing an officer, after that approval has been consummated by actual dismissal.

Undoubtedly, if the sentence should be disapproved and the action of the President result in establishing the innocence of the officer, all the legal consequences of such action in favor of the officer would follow. No man would assert the power of the President to reverse his judicial decision afterward to the prejudice of the accused. But why should that judgment be any less permanent because it establishes his guilt? It must be accepted as final and conclusive in the one case as in the other, because it is the judgment which the law authorizes to settle the rights in controversy, from which no appeal has been given. And it may be added that if it be open to subsequent consideration and reversal, the same principle would entitle a dissatisfied party to demand any number of reconsiderations and decisions, so that the subject would, practically, be open to endless controversy and litigation. (11 Opinions, 19.)

In 1865 Attorney-General Speed put the whole question in a very clear light, as follows:

Courts-martial are judicial tribunals, constituted by statutory authority, and organized in pursuance of statutory regulations for the administration of a great and an important department of jurisprudence, the military law (or law-military). They are, therefore, in the strictest sense courts of justice, having jurisdiction of a large and in some respects distinct community of our fellow-citizens. Courts-martial are not only legally constituted courts of justice, but also courts of justice, whose judgments in cases fitted for their consideration and determination are as final, conclusive, and authoritative as those of any judicial tribunal of the country. In England the military courts are as free from the control and dictation of the sovereign as the highest civil courts of the realm. He may remit the punishment or order the court to sit again, but he can no more decree any particular alteration of their sentence than he can alter the judgment of a civil court or the verdict of a jury.

In this country the President has power not only to pardon persons convicted in military courts, but also to commute. After the sentence, however, has been approved and carried into effect there is no revisory power by which it can be rescinded, annulled, or modified. It forever stands as the judgment of a court. These considerations appear to me to be pertinent to the present inquiry; for if they give a correct idea of the legal character of courts-martial, of their proceedings and jurisdiction, it would seem to be clear that when their judgments become finalities, when their proceedings have been consummated by the action of the competent revisory authority, the records of those proceedings should be regarded as standing upon the same footing, so far as the parties affected and the community at large are concerned, as the records of the ordinary tribunals of civil and criminal jurisdiction. (11 Opinions, 137.)

Passing, then, from these opinions of Attorneys-General, which certainly are entitled to respectful consideration, I desire to call attention to the solemn adjudications of the Supreme Court of the United States, which ought to be decisive of the whole matter. I will detain the committee with only two citations. The case of Dynes vs. Hooper, 20 Howard, already referred to, was an action for assault and battery and false imprisonment, where the plaintiff, having been tried and convicted by court-martial, was sentenced to imprisonment but sought to be released by habeas corpus. Justice Swayne, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in that case, said:

But the case in hand is not one of a court without jurisdiction over the subject-matter, or that of one which has neglected the forms and rules of procedure enjoined for the exercise of jurisdiction. It was regularly convened. Whatever the sentence, it could not have been carried into execution but by the confirmation of the President. And if a sentence be so confirmed it becomes final, and must be executed unless the President pardons the offender. It is in the nature of an appeal to the officer ordering the court, who is made by the law the arbiter of the legality and propriety of the court's sentence. When confirmed it is altogether beyond the jurisdiction or inquiry of any civil tribunal whatever unless it shall be in a case in which the court had not jurisdiction over the subject-matter or charge, or one in which, having jurisdiction over the subject-matter, it has failed to observe the rules prescribed by the statute for its exercise. With the sentences of courts-martial which have been convened regularly and have proceeded legally and by which punishments are directed not forbidden by law, civil courts have nothing to do, nor are they in any way alterable by them. If it were otherwise the civil courts would virtually administer the rules and articles of war, irrespective of those to whom that duty and obligation has been confided by the laws of the United States, from whose decisions no appeal or jurisdiction of any kind has been given to the civil magistrate or civil courts.

The second case to which I desire to call attention is the following: In 1878, Alvin R. Reed, paymaster's clerk in the United States Navy, was court-martialed and sentenced to two years' imprisonment, the loss of all pay, a fine of $500, and, at the expiration of the term of imprisonment, to be dishonorably dismissed from the naval service of the United States. The sentence was duly approved by the revisory power, and, while in confinement under this sentence on board a naval vessel in the harbor of Boston, Reed sued out a writ of habeas corpus and brought his case before the United States circuit court for the district of Massachusetts. The case was decided against him. He thereupon removed it to the Supreme Court of the United States, and in November, 1879, Justice Swayne, delivering the opinion of the court, again said:

The constitutionality of the acts of Congress touching Army and Navy courts-martial in this country, if there could ever have been any doubt about it, is no longer an open question in this court. (20 Howard, 65.) The court in this case had jurisdiction over the person and the case. It is the organism provided by law and clothed with the duty of administering justice in this class of cases. Having had such jurisdiction, its proceedings can not be collaterally impeached for any mere error or irregularity, if there were any, committed within the sphere of its authority. Its judgments, when approved as required, rest on the same basis, and are surrounded by the same considerations which give conclusiveness to the judgments of other legal tribunals, including as well the lowest as the highest, under like circumstances. (Ex parte Reed.)

If, upon the consideration of these authorities, the conviction obtains that the findings of a court-martial, where approved by the proper revisory power, are as conclusive as the judgments of the highest legal tribunal, it can not be possible that any member of this House would attempt to evade the consequences of such conviction by asserting that Congress had the power to set aside and annul the solemn judgments of the judiciary. Such a position is too hazardous to be held for a single moment, and is easily overcome by an array of authority absolutely overwhelming. A single citation is sufficient to demonstrate how untenable is such ground. In the case of The State vs. Fleming and others, decided by the supreme court of Tennessee and reported in 7 Humphrey, the facts in the case are these: The Legislature of the State of Tennessee sought by legislative enactment to relieve the defendants of the judgment of a court pronounced against them and in favor of the State for violation of the liquor law. The legality of such an enactment was passed upon by the supreme court of the State, and Judge Turley, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

The powers of the State of Tennessee are vested in legislative, executive, and judicial departments, each separate and distinct from the other, with their power and duties well defined by the constitution, and by which each is kept within its appropriate sphere of action. The Legislature can make the law, but the courts must expound it and execute it, with the aid of the executive, when his action may become necessary for that purpose. The Legislature has no power to interfere with the administration of justice, either criminal or civil, in the courts. After conviction the governor may pardon. We are therefore constrained to hold that the resolution under which these defendants claim their discharge is void for want of power in the Legislature to pass it.

Another case is so directly in point and emanates from so respectable a source that I can not refrain from a brief quotation from it. The supreme court of Massachusetts in 1861, in the case of Denny vs. Matton and others, held, Chief-Justice Bigelow delivering the opinion of the court, as follows:

The wise and salutary provisions of our Constitution, by which its framers sought to declare the distribution of the different powers of the Government and to keep them separate and distinct, is not a mere abstract truth. It is the exclusive province of courts of justice to apply established principles to cases within their jurisdiction, and to enforce their decisions by rendering judgment and executing them by suitable process. The Legislature has no power to interfere with this jurisdiction in such manner as to change the decision of cases pending before courts, or to impair or set aside their judgments, or take cases out of the settled course of judicial proceedings. It is on this principle that it has been held that the Legislature have no power to grant a new trial or direct a rehearing of a cause which has been once judicially settled. An act of the Legislature can not set aside or annul final judgments or decrees. This is the highest exercise of judicial authority. Lord Coke calls judgments and executions the "fruit of the law." To vest in the Legislature the power to take them away or to impair their effect on the rights of parties would be to deprive the judiciary of its most essential prerogative. It could then no longer finally adjudicate and determine the rights of litigants.

The will of the Legislature would be substituted in the place of fixed rules and established principles, by which alone judicial tribunals can be governed. The power to correct errors and to revise and reverse judgments would be transferred to the legislative branch of the Government, even to the extent of controlling the final decrees of the tribunal of last resort. Such an exercise of authority would lead to the entire destruction of the order and harmony of our system of government, and to a manifest infraction of one of its fundamental principles. Indeed, it is difficult to see how the Legislature could more palpably invade the judicial department and effectually usurp its functions, than to pass statutes which should operate to set aside or annul judgments of courts in their nature final and which would otherwise be conclusive on the rights of parties. If such was the intent of the Legislature in passing the act it can not be carried into effect, because it would operate to annul or reverse a final judgment of this court.

Mr. Chairman, having thus hastily reviewed some of the authorities in support of the proposition that this measure is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, I have little else to say. Indeed, if this position is well taken, there is nothing else to be said, for in such case the guilt or innocence of Fitz-John Porter becomes wholly immaterial. If the legal position is impregnable, that is the end of this controversy, for I am reluctant to believe that we will not all bow in submission to the behests of the Constitution. Yet I am frank to confess, when I consider the history of this case, the pertinacity with which it has been prosecuted, and the section from which it receives its chief support, that I am apprehensive that the restraining influences of the Constitution will be of little avail. Of course, if there is a predetermination to override all legal and constitutional restraint and pass this measure at all hazards, then no barrier, however formidable, will deter the majority from consummating such a purpose. You have the power in this House to accomplish that end.

But let me say to you, gentlemen—let me say to the Democratic party North and South, the South in the lead, the North following, that if by the force of numbers you do this thing the country will not hold you guiltless. The people whom Fitz-John Porter betrayed are content with the verdict. Why not let it stand? Why seek to reverse it? Do you question the capacity or integrity of the court? Fitz-John Porter was tried and convicted by a military tribunal composed of gentlemen of exalted character and acknowledged ability. Six of the nine generals, Hunter, Hitchcock, King, Ricketts, Casey, and Buford, were graduates of the Military Academy, familiar with all the details and discipline of military life. Generals Prentiss and Slough were men of high civil and military renown, while General Garfield, for brilliant achievements in the field and forum, is assigned a foremost place in the nation's regard.

Such was the high character of the tribunal which convicted Fitz-John Porter. It sat where the sound of the battle's thunder had been heard, and summoned into its presence the witnesses, chief and subaltern, from that field of carnage and treachery. It sat with open doors. The accused was present in person and by eminent counsel, among whom was the Hon. Reverdy Johnson. It prosecuted the investigation for forty-five days; examined eighteen persons on the part of the Government and twenty-two on behalf of the accused—forty witnesses in all. Among them were Pope, Roberts, Heintzelman, McDowell, Park, Morrow, Griffith, Reynolds, Sykes, Burnside, Buford, and George B. McClellan. Judge Holt submitted the case without argument. The accused was heard at length, after which the court found Fitz-John Porter guilty of disobedience of the lawful commands of his superior officer and misbehavior in the face of the enemy, and thereupon sentenced him to be dismissed from the military service of the United States and forever disqualified from holding any office of profit or trust under the Government thereof. The findings and sentence of the court were approved by Abraham Lincoln, whose name has become a synonym of justice and honesty. But it has been said that injustice was done Fitz-John Porter and that the judgment of the court was swayed by the passions and prejudices of the hour. Sir, it is a notorious fact that a majority of that court were Porter's personal friends, none his enemies. He himself, upon his arraignment, declared himself content with the detail. The sentence of the court gives assurance of its friendship, for if Fitz-John Porter was guilty of one-half with which he was charged he ought to have paid the forfeit of his life. The blood that courses in his veins is no richer than that which warms the heart of the humblest subaltern, and if a private soldier had been guilty of what Fitz-John Porter was convicted he would have been shot on the field. But do you come here for an impartial tribunal? Is there no bias in this panel? At the risk of being charged with reviving the memories of the past, may I inquire if there are not some gentlemen in this array whose cause was directly benefited by Porter's treachery, and if such, do you think you are or can be impartial judges? Do you believe the betrayer of a public trust should be tried by the parties who profited by the treachery? Is that your idea of an impartial verdict? What a travesty this is upon justice! The beneficiaries of Porter's crime gravely sit in judgment to condemn Lincoln and Garfield and acquit Porter! That, too, after twenty-three years, nearly a quarter of a century, has sealed the lips of witnesses and silenced the voice of the court. Why not let this judgment stand? Why seek to reverse it?

You who are so sensitive about reviving the memories of the past, in the name of peace why not let this rest? I fear there is but one explanation. Not long since it was proclaimed in this Hall that the "South would not be content until it had wiped from the statute-book all the war legislation of Abraham Lincoln." What was then regarded as a harmless outburst of passion seems after all to have been a startling prophecy. The beginning of its fulfillment is at hand. Legislative enactment and solemn adjudication are alike marked for destruction. Where the work is to end Heaven only knows. It looks as if nothing was secure, nothing settled, nothing exempt from this unholy purpose of demolition. But let me say to the majority of this House and to the Democratic party that you are making a fearful mistake in signalizing your return to national control by impeaching the honesty of Abraham Lincoln and reversing the judgment of James A. Garfield. Though their lips are sealed be assured that the people who honored them and their works living will defend them dead. You may enter judgment against them here, but it will be indignantly reversed by the grand assizes of the people. I am conscious that we can do little else here than to protest against the passage of this measure. In the name of the Constitution which it overrides, of the law which it wantonly violates, of the good order and discipline of the Army which it disturbs and destroys, and in the name of the unnumbered dead who fell a sacrifice to the treachery of Fitz-John Porter, I protest against it.

Mr. BURROWS. I yield fifteen minutes to Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. KELLEY addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BURROWS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] for thirty minutes.

Mr. STEELE. If it makes no difference to the gentleman I would be glad to have my friend from Illinois yield to the other side at the present time. We have only two hours, and one hour and forty-five minutes of that will be claimed by the other side. We do not want, of course, three, four, or five speeches on the other side without one on this side.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I am willing to agree to anything suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, but unless there can be some arrangement made of that sort, I hope I will be allowed to proceed with my argument.

Mr. STEELE. I understand the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] is ready to take the floor at this time, and I hope the gentleman from Illinois will give way to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman to proceed in his hour.

Mr. BURROWS. Of course I would not like to lose the hour to which I am entitled, but if by unanimous consent——

Mr. STEELE. As I have said, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] is ready to go on.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. If I can be recognized at the close of his speech that will be agreeable to me.

Mr. BRAGG. I shall object to the gentleman from Michigan yielding the floor unless he now occupies his hour. That will consume all the time on that side belonging to the discussion of this bill.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. That being the case, I will now proceed with my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. For how long does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BURROWS. For thirty minutes.

Mr. THOMAS addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BURROWS. How much time is remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seventeen minutes remaining.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Chairman, I have not prepared any speech upon this subject, and will not therefore undertake to discuss it according to historical precedent and military science. I propose only to state facts within my own knowledge derived from my own observation, what I saw and know, together with facts established by indubitable testimony. I had not thought it necessary for me to say anything upon this very notable case, which has elicited a greater amount of discussion and interest than any case of the kind in modern times. But as what I know and purpose saying may contribute something to what I conceive to be just, I have no right to withhold it. I have no prejudice in this matter. I have heard that General Porter is a Democrat, but that makes no difference with me. He is a man, and the question now to be tried is whether the bill we are considering is or is not a measure of justice. In determining such a question I do not care to know what the political or religious opinions of the person may be. Is the measure just? Observe the golden rule, which can not be too often repeated—do unto others as you would they should do unto you.

It was stated on yesterday by some one on this side of the Chamber that after the battle of Cedar Run, on the 9th of August, General Pope withdrew to the east side of the Rappahannock River. That is a mistake. He concentrated his army in the neighborhood of Culpeper Court House, and there remained, receiving re-enforcements until the 20th of August, when General Lee with a part of his army began to advance on him, taking him in flank, when Pope retreated to the east side of the river. Lee's forces occupied the west side for a distance of 3, 4, or 5 miles and Pope's confronting on the opposite bank. Artillery firing across the river was continuous with short intervals for a day or two when on the 22d occurred the affair of Hazel River.

A Federal brigade had the temerity to recross to our side, which General Trimble with his brigade, to which I belonged, attacked and drove them to the east side again with considerable loss. While these operations were going on Gen. J. E. B. Stuart with a small portion of his command crossed the river unobserved and penetrated to Pope's rear at Catlett's Station and captured his papers, his coat, and headquarters, which were not then "in the saddle," and came very near taking Pope also. He got Pope's papers by which General Lee learned the number and disposition of Pope's forces. So soon as that information was obtained General Jackson began to extend his line to the left up the river in a quiet and somewhat stealthy manner, Longstreet covering the ground abandoned, until Jackson seemed to have withdrawn beyond the observation of Pope's forces, when early on the morning of the 25th he crossed the river away up—I have forgotten the name of the crossing—and marched rapidly through the country guarded by a cordon of cavalry on his right to cover his movement from the Federals, until he reached Thoroughfare Gap; passing through that he changed direction but continued his march until he reached Bristoe Station, which was about dark on the second day. In two days his men had marched a distance of upward of 60 miles, the greater part of the time—in fact from and after the forenoon of the first day—upon green corn gathered from the fields, and half-ripe apples.

The Louisiana brigade, then I believe commanded by Hays, was the first, and Trimble's the second, to reach Bristoe. The first-named formed along the railroad to the right, and the latter to the left of the station house and hotel, in which some officers were captured just as they sat down to a supper which Jackson and his staff appropriated. Three trains of cars, almost empty, were heard coming, and measures were speedily taken by which the first was thrown down an embankment and the other two running into this made a huge and frightful wreck. They were trains which had been transporting troops to Pope. The regiment to which I belonged was detailed to remove the wreck for the purpose of saving one of the engines to run down to the junction and haul off up toward the valley the stores we expected to capture, while Trimble with his other regiments proceeded toward the junction to capture it that night. Soon finding it impossible, without appliances, to move the wreck and save the engine, I in person informed General Jackson of that fact, and he directed that we set fire to it and rejoin our brigade, which he informed me was on its way to Manassas Junction.

It was then about an hour after dark. We had marched upward of 30 miles that day, but 4 miles farther we expected to draw rations. These, of which we were sorely in need, put renewed life and mettle in our heels and we made it in a little over an hour, reached the brigade just in time, charged and captured the place with the loss of thirteen men in the Twenty-first Georgia Regiment by the discharge of a battery of seven pieces of artillery which we captured before they could be fired a second time. A vast quantity of stores was captured. The sutlers' shops were broken and eviscerated. Fires were built and cooking and eating began. Our men were ragged and dirty; some were barefooted and others bareheaded. There was a sort of negro camp-meeting going on there, but the worshipers fled in all directions except that from which we were arriving. The bareheaded men who could not find men's hats took the negro women's hats, usually trimmed with red ribbon. At midnight to see soldiers thus attired who had marched 35 miles that day, dancing around the camp-fires, eating lobster salad, drinking Rhine wine and "sure enough coffee with sugar in it," presented a scene the ludicrousness of which can not well be described and was equaled only by their wonderful power of endurance and cheerfulness under the most trying circumstances. It was difficult to whip such men commanded by such generals. The next morning, at an early hour, we heard a train coming from the direction of Washington.

After crossing Bull Run it halted, and Taylor's New Jersey brigade, which it had brought down, formed line of battle and marched up beautifully, and supposing that our movement was but a cavalry raid, they had come to drive us away. Trimble's brigade was lying behind the crest of a hill, eager to fire, while Stuart had his horse artillery in the old forts. When near enough we opened fire, which killed General Taylor and dispersed his brigade. Trimble followed them, capturing prisoners occasionally, to Centreville. After an hour's rest we marched back to the Junction, which was 15 miles marched that day. We lay there and slept that night. The next morning a large quantity of the bacon captured had been cut into pieces of such size as to be carried, and the boxes of crackers and barrels of hard-tack had been opened and piled about so that every man as he marched between these piles might help himself. They did so, and many, fearing that rations might fall short again, helped themselves quite lavishly. When we marched away about every third or fourth man, in addition to his musket and accouterments, had a box of crackers on his shoulder, while each one of his messmates carried a large hunk of bacon. They did not wish to be reduced to green corn and apples again.

But as the heat of the day increased these burdens grew intolerable and were cast down by the roadside, except what could be conveniently carried. We crossed Bull Run and marched out in the neighborhood of Centreville, wheeled to the left, recrossed Bull Run at the stone bridge, wheeled to the right and marched up that stream, and then to the left, and formed in the woods on the identical ground where General McDowell began the first battle of Manassas, or Bull Run, on the 21st of July, 1861. Our line is pretty accurately indicated by the upper blue line on the map before me, running from northeast on Bull Run in a southwesterly direction to a point northwest of Groveton.

General Jackson's command consisted then of three divisions—A. P. Hill's division; what was known as "Stonewall" division, which General Jackson formerly commanded; and Ewell's division—numbering about twenty-two thousand men present for duty. These troops, except two brigades, were formed in the woods on that ground, with the right extending near to the pike above Groveton. The two brigades referred to were left under the command of General Ewell at Bristoe Station, where they remained and had an action with General Hooker, I believe, in the forenoon or about midday of the 28th, when he withdrew, marched across the plain, and joined the command in the position I have just indicated. In that position, and concealed in the woods, we remained for some two or three hours. About sunset I heard distinctly the cannonading at Thoroughfare Gap. Longstreet was driving General Ricketts out of the Gap and securing his passage. It was a good many miles away. Just at that moment I saw the dust rising to our right and right rear. I knew not what was the cause of this, but felt a deep concern on account of our position, for, although I had no military education except what I had acquired in the army, I knew well that General Jackson's movement, cutting loose from the main body and passing around to the rear of an army stronger than both wings of General Lee's united, was a very perilous experiment, especially if attempted in the presence of an enterprising commander of the opposing forces. It was a piece of audacity which showed how Lee and Jackson esteemed Pope as a commander.

While I was thus looking, General Jackson and General Ewell were sitting on their horses, unaccompanied by any staff officers, some twenty steps out from the edge of the woods. They seemed to be in conversation with each other.

A MEMBER. What day was that?

Mr. OATES. That was the evening of Thursday, the 28th of August, 1862.

Just about this moment I saw the head of the Federal column passing along the Gainesville pike, which is indicated on the map by that long line to the right. They were passing along up that pike from west, eastwardly toward Bull Run. That was King's division, my gallant friend General BRAGG commanding, I believe, the leading brigade, known as "the Iron Brigade." That column was passing along that pike in the direction of Groveton. My apprehensions were much increased by the appearance of that column and not knowing what was raising this dust in our right rear. An officer came through the woods from the rear and asked where General Jackson was. I pointed to him and he rode up; and I listened to hear what the officer had to say. He delivered his message by telling General Jackson that General Stuart sent his compliments and informed General Jackson that he was in position on his right. I then knew that the dust raised over there was Stuart's cavalry. The moment that message was delivered General Jackson pointed to this column, directed Ewell to advance, and darted away. Thereupon Taliaferro's brigade moved up, and then two or three regiments from Lawton's brigade. Trimble's was held in reserve for a time. Others, perhaps, might have moved forward. Looking as I stood there, I saw these columns of hostile men meet in the open plain. It was then so near dark that when they fired the flash lighted up the whole field, and the spurts of fire from the muzzles of their pieces presented a scene unsurpassed in sublimity.

The battle proceeded. The brigade I was in was soon ordered into it, passing through a little copse of woods which my friend General BRAGG well remembers, for his command had driven our left back, and the brigade I was in went there for the purpose of retaking it. Advancing to the fence on the opposite side, we found his command in a gulley that was washed in the hillside, and there at a distance of 20 feet from each other the fire was delivered into the opposing lines for half an hour or more. Then the Union line was withdrawn a short distance, but to indicate that they were not worsted they set up a cheer of triumph. We held the field. The losses were heavy for the numbers engaged. Generals Ewell and Trimble were both wounded that night. Some one stated in this debate that Trimble was killed on the 29th. That is a mistake; he was severely wounded, but is not dead yet. He now resides in Baltimore.

The next morning General Jackson's troops were brought from their hiding place—or perhaps the movement was made during the night. At any rate, the next morning they occupied that unfinished railroad cut. At some places it was an embankment; at others it was a cut. That was the line from Bull Run near Sudley to the point indicated on the map, just above the end of that blue line nearly opposite Groveton. General Stark's Louisiana brigade occupied the right and Trimble's brigade was the next. I belonged to the regiment on the right of that. There was no engagement in the forenoon of Friday, the 29th, so far as I am aware. There was skirmishing. There was artillery firing. The carnage of the field the next morning was sickening. I felt nauseated, and leaving my superior in rank, who was in command of the regiment, I rode away for the purpose of going to a farm-house and getting some coffee. A shell from the enemy's battery had destroyed the coffee that one of my comrades was making, and I had to go into the country to get some. As I rode on, to our right, west from our position, I found General Early, whom I knew very well, with his brigade concealed in a copse of woods, some 200 or 300 yards from where our right rested.

I think in addition to his brigade the Eighth Louisiana Regiment was there. I spoke with him and asked him if any of our troops were beyond him, and whether I would be in danger if I should go in that direction. He said he thought not. I rode on. He said there were no other troops of our command out there, and that I might proceed in the direction of some houses which were in sight across a little creek. I rode on some little distance and turning down a steep embankment I found at a bold spring a number of confederate soldiers filling their canteens. I inquired what command they belonged to. I soon discovered among them two or three men of my acquaintance. They belonged to Longstreet's corps. I asked them where their commands were, and they pointed, stating that they were up in that direction, some half or three-quarters of a mile, in a piece of woods. That was the middle of the day. The position was at most not more than 1 mile from our right, where Early was.

A MEMBER. Was not that Jones's division?

Mr. OATES. I do not remember whose commands they were, except that they belonged to Longstreet's corps. After going to the house and getting some coffee I returned. When I reached the field, attracted by the increased volume of firing, it was 2 o'clock or thereabouts. I can not be accurate. It might have been half past 1 or 2; it was about 2 o'clock.

When I reached my command an advance was being made in our immediate front. That advance was of two brigades. They came up and made an attack which was repulsed by Trimble and Stark's brigades.

A few moments afterward, perhaps half an hour, a single brigade, I do not know whether one of those previously engaged or another, advanced to attack Stark. Most gallantly it came up to this embankment, and I saw the colors of the opposing forces flapping together in the breeze while the men were fighting with clubbed muskets and cobble-stones, which lay there in great abundance. My regiment fired right oblique in aid of their Lousiana comrades, and the brigade assaulting them was soon driven away, leaving a large number of killed and wounded behind.

There was no other attack on that part of the line until a late hour, but further down on A. P. Hill's part of the line several assaults were made. Soon after this there was an attack made to our left on Hill and there was very heavy firing for the number of troops engaged. Having no enemy on our immediate front I went down there and stood on the railroad embankment and looked at that fighting. There was no embankment and no cut in the railroad at that point. They marched through the valley; a brigade at a time would march up to about the same point and attack one of Hill's brigades, and when exhausted it would retire and another take its place. That continued for at least two hours, with intervals of from ten to fifteen minutes and half an hour.

In this way there was a good deal of fighting done on the 29th. There was no general engagement in the sense that term is frequently used; that is to say, there was no marching up of a continuous line and a general assault on our position. Attacks were made by detachment. Two brigades were as great a number of troops as assaulted our lines at any one time that day. A great deal of damage was done and there was much hard fighting. Artillery firing from both sides was kept up all the time.

Mr. STEELE. Would not some of these assaults on other fields be called battles?

Mr. OATES. Compared with the fighting on other fields I do not know but they would be regarded as considerable battles. The battles of the Revolution and the war with Mexico were insignificant in point of damage done compared with many of the engagements on the 29th. I passed over the field after the battle of the 30th and that portion of it where I witnessed these successive assaults on Hill's line, and I never saw on any field a greater number of dead men on the same space of ground or dead men lying thicker than they lay there.

I have no purpose to suppress any truth in this matter. I have my own convictions about it and those convictions have arisen from my knowledge of what I saw, and were not derived from any testimony presented in this case on the trial of Porter.

It is insisted by some that Porter was a traitor and wanted the Union army defeated because Pope commanded it. I do not believe a word of that. They say that he should have pressed on under the joint order and have fought anything that he found in his front. The argument against him assumes that if he had fought on the 29th the result would have been a Union victory. The opportunity for victory, if any was to be found possible, was lost when McDowell and Porter failed to confront and assault Longstreet at or near Gainesville on the morning of the 29th. The two united had over thirty thousand men, a greater number than Longstreet had. Pope's idea seems to have been to crush Jackson before Longstreet could unite with him. This was not practicable; for after sending thirty thousand against Longstreet—and a less number could not have kept him separated from Jackson under the skillful direction of that greatest of generals, Robert E. Lee—Pope would have had but little, if any, over thirty thousand men left, and with that number he could not have whipped Jackson with his twenty-two thousand men in the strong position he had chosen.

But had Pope reversed his strategy, or, more properly, if he had possessed such an accomplishment, and had sent fifteen thousand men only to hold Jackson at bay and had concentrated his other forty-five thousand and fallen on Longstreet at Gainesville, he would have stood a good chance to have beaten him, and with Longstreet beaten Jackson's position would have been exceedingly precarious, and with any other general hopeless. The science of war is to concentrate at the point of assault a greater number of men than your adversary has there. That usually wins unless the greater number are very inferior men, poorly disciplined, and badly handled. Whose fault was it that McDowell and Porter did not, on the morning of the 29th, strike Longstreet? Certainly not Porter's, for McDowell ranked and commanded him, and after McDowell withdrew Porter was too weak to make the attack with any hope of success, having only between nine and ten thousand men present under his command. So if any one was to blame besides Pope himself for the failure to attack Longstreet when there was a possibility of success, McDowell was the man and not Porter. But Porter was found guilty of failing to obey the 4.30 o'clock p. m. order, which he did not receive until a late hour; the time is uncertain, but so late that it was impossible for him to have marched 2½ to 3 miles and have attacked Jackson's right before dark, and at that hour Longstreet had connected his line with Jackson's.

But had Longstreet been ten miles away and Porter had obeyed the order and attacked Jackson's right, it would not have availed, because Early would have formed line from Stark's right across to the Bull Run Mountains, his right on a precipice at the little creek where the ground was so rugged that troops could not march over it in line of battle in the day time. From this position he could not have driven Early that night. In fact, however, Longstreet was there within 1 or 2 miles of Jackson's right two hours before Pope wrote his 4.30 order, and had Porter obeyed it such obedience would inevitably have resulted in the destruction of his corps.

At any time that afternoon had Porter moved to the front and attacked he would have been repulsed with very considerable loss. Nothing else would have been accomplished. Whether Porter intended it or not he made the best possible use of his troops, for by hanging on Longstreet's flank that afternoon he kept him out of the fight which was waged against Jackson. Some nine thousand men were held in a position which kept nearly three times that number—about twenty-five thousand or more—out of an engagement which was going on near by, and was the very best possible use that could have been made of them; and whether Porter did it purposely or inadvertently it was good service and ought to weigh something in his behalf. I can not believe that Longstreet would have remained out of the fighting going on in Jackson's front all that afternoon but for Porter on his flank. Lee was there in person and was perhaps anticipating and awaiting such a blunder as it would have been for Porter's corps to have interposed between Longstreet and Jackson.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Let me ask the gentleman from Alabama if it is not a fact that three brigades were sent from Longstreet to Jackson?

Mr. OATES. Yes; two to attack and one in support, but just after dark.

Mr. GROUT. Let me ask the gentleman from Alabama: Is it not true that Hood's two brigades attacked Reynolds as early as 1 or 2 o'clock and drove him back?

Mr. OATES. I have no knowledge of that. I did not see it; it may have been so. I do not pretend to know. It did not come within my personal observation.

Mr. GROUT. Have you read General Reynolds's testimony——

Mr. OATES. I have not.

Mr. GROUT. He being a witness called by Porter before the court-martial?

Mr. OATES. No, sir; I have not read it. But it does not matter. Porter's presence, of which Lee and Longstreet were aware, on Longstreet's flank manifestly kept him from sending at least part of his force to assist Jackson and drive his assailants away.

As I said before, there was no other attack upon our right until a late hour. About deep dusk the Federal lines moved up and assaulted Stark's and Trimble's brigades again. We were engaged the night before and had been in that position all day, and I know I felt, in common with the men, that we were in a very precarious condition.

We were in fact nearly worn out, and knowing Longstreet was near could not help wondering why it was that relief was not sent to us. The impression seemed to gain ground among the men that we would be driven from our position, when our hearts were made glad at last by the arrival of Hood's men who reached us about dark and drove the enemy back and continued to drive them for an hour or more and for near a mile toward Bull Run, when Hood withdrew to the west side of Groveton for the night.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That was near 9 o'clock.

Mr. OATES. It might have been 9 o'clock when they returned. Dark comes at that season of the year at a pretty late hour, and an hour after dark would be probably near 9 o'clock. It was quite dark at that time. None of Longstreet's troops came to Jackson's support until that moment that I am aware of. Then I repeat, whether it was intended or not by Porter, I think the effect was incontrovertible that his presence on Longstreet's right kept Longstreet's troops out of the engagement of the 29th. If nine thousand men can be made to keep twenty-five thousand of the adversaries force out of an engagement they are indeed well employed.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But they did not succeed in that, for you admit that several brigades were sent to Jackson.

Mr. OATES. Two only to fight; one in support, and that, I say, was at dark.

Mr. GROUT. Only two brigades at dark, you say, attacked Pope's left? Now, has the gentleman read the reports of Lee and Longstreet carefully?

Mr. OATES. I have not.

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman will read those reports he will find that eight out of eleven of Longstreet's brigades were engaged on Pope's left in support of his line.

Mr. OATES. Well, in support that might have been, but I speak of the brigades that were actually engaged, the two brigades—Law's and Hood's Texas brigades—were the only ones actually engaged that evening.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. And Wilcox's command went to his support.

Mr. VAN EATON. And did not fire a gun. I will say to the gentleman that I was in that command and know that to be a fact.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But the command went to Jackson's assistance.

Mr. VAN EATON. But the firing had ceased before we got there.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But he left his position in front of Porter, nevertheless.

Mr. OATES. Now, I have an opinion about General Porter's disobedience of orders. It seems from all I can gather there was some disobedience. General Pope did not know the true situation himself. He thought that Longstreet would not arrive before the 30th, perhaps the evening of the 30th, when Longstreet had already passed through Thoroughfare Gap. He thought that Jackson was in retreat and sent forward King's division to intercept him in the neighborhood of Centreville. General Porter knew these facts. He had gathered from a courier from the front that some of Longstreet's troops were in the neighborhood of Gainesville. He knew that there were some skirmishers and scouts in his front. Yet, according to the strict letter of military law, he should have obeyed the order and advanced, because obedience of orders is one of the highest duties that a soldier owes to his commander and his country's cause. According to strict military law it was his duty to have advanced unless he saw and knew it would result in destruction of his command, and from the evidence as I learn it he did not have sufficient information to determine that it would result in destruction.

But he had no confidence in General Pope—not that he was disloyal or desired to see victory over his countrymen. I have no idea he desired any such thing. But in doubt about what to do, and not having sufficient confidence in his superior, General Pope, to act upon the order, he hesitated and held back, and in that way, hesitating and doubting, he failed to obey the order.

Mr. REED, of Maine. And was guilty of a military crime.

Mr. OATES. I think that the only offense he was guilty of was what I state, and that the punishment he received has been greatly disproportionate to that. I think to have been relieved from his command, to have been practically retired from his command during the war would, in all conscience, have been as severe a punishment as ought to have been inflicted upon him, and that would have been a very severe punishment on an ambitious officer.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. I understood him to say, that Pope did not understand the situation; that he thought Longstreet could not get up until the 30th, and that he did not understand the situation because he thought Jackson was retreating; that he had issued his order to Porter, but that Porter did know Longstreet was there; that he had come up with some of his soldiers, and therefore Porter hesitated. Now, the question I desire to ask the gentleman is this, if Porter did know that Pope was under a wrong impression was it not Porter's duty to inform Pope immediately of that fact, and not stay there all that day refusing to obey the order?

Mr. OATES. If he had any information.

Mr. BRUMM. I understood the gentleman to say he had.

Mr. OATES. If he had any information of an important character which his commanding officer did not possess, it was his duty to communicate it. But it was not his duty to undertake to correct any mistakes which his general had made. That would have been regarded as a piece of impertinence.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Am I correct in understanding the gentleman to say that in his opinion General Porter was guilty of a military crime, but that he demurs to the amount of punishment?

Mr. OATES. I did not put it in that way, nor will I do it. I prefer to employ my own language.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Is not that about it?

Mr. OATES. No, sir. This is it: Porter, on account of a want of confidence in Pope—and which many others shared—on account of his want of confidence in Pope's ability, and ignorance of the situation, Porter doubted whether he should obey the order; and therein, according to the strict letter of military law, he was perhaps censurable, because the duty of a soldier is to obey orders. It is the duty of a corps commander, for he is next to the commanding general in importance, not only to obey the orders of his superior but to give hearty co-operation in the execution of the plans of the general commanding, if known to him, and it is likewise the duty of such general to make known to his corps commander the part of the general plan he is expected to execute, and then in the execution of it he may exercise his discretion in the absence of specific orders. But when he receives such an order, as it must be admitted Porter received, whether it be day or night, although it may be contrary to his judgment, it is his duty to obey it unless he knows that it will involve his command in destruction. And while I believe that Porter did that which was the best, yet there is no evidence sufficiently showing that he disobeyed on account of his knowledge of the situation, and hence I can not honestly conclude that he was wholly guiltless. There were and are, however, many mitigating circumstances.

There is much allowance to be made when he is tried by an impartial tribunal, and all of the facts are known. I have nothing to say against the men who tried him. There is much allowance to be made for human nature. It is such, I care not whose the case may be, that if a man doubts and knows that the undertaking before him is perilous, he is very much inclined to hesitate. Now, while I think that General Porter was not wholly guiltless, I do not regard him as a traitor nor as guilty of a crime. If he failed to obey and act with promptness upon the order of his superior, that, perhaps, ought to have relieved him of his command and sent him to the rear; but it ought not, in my judgment, to have sent him before a court-martial, or brought upon him the punishment that was inflicted. We all know that in times of war, courts-martial, composed like other courts of men, are influenced by excitement and prejudices that do not influence men when they are free from such perilous and exciting surroundings as those under which General Porter was tried. It is natural, too, that when defeat has come upon an army, when a campaign has resulted in failure, those who have failed should make efforts to discover a victim upon whom to put the responsibility. In this case, unfortunately for Porter, it fell upon him, and a much severer punishment was meted out to him than he deserved. I do not regard this bill as wiping out the sentence of the court or declaring that it was all wrong, for it does not propose to give him back pay. If I thought him guiltless of any wrong I would say give him that. This is simply an act of justice. The sentence of the court was too harsh, too severe. For an act merely censurable on account of its animus and bad example, he was made the victim for Pope's defeat, a responsibility which did not attach to him. There may have been some political prejudices at the bottom of it.

General Porter has suffered long enough—yea, too long; and now, in my humble judgment, is entitled to the relief which this bill proposes to give him, and I will cheerfully vote for it. [Applause.]

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, how much time is left?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty minutes.

Mr. BRAGG. I yield now to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEBER.]

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire an opportunity to say a few words upon this bill.

Mr. BRAGG (to Mr. CURTIN). I will give you time to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIN. Very well. But I want to say just one word now, Mr. Chairman. I do not agree with the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr OATES] that Fitz-John Porter disobeyed orders.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time allotted to me I can not go into the evidence, nor have I desire to do so. Plausible arguments have been and can be made for and against. It involves days and weeks of patient, careful examination and study, as has been stated by gentlemen upon this floor, who yet point to the public sentiment and to the judgment of the Union soldiers upon the innocence or guilt of General Porter as one of the reasons for the votes which they intend to cast. Three thousand pages of testimony have been examined, involving weeks of study, as has been stated here, to reach conclusions, and yet the two days claimed to have been devoted to the consideration of the case are pointed to as indicating the careful review made by President Lincoln. Therefore it would seem to be more profitable to deal with the conclusions of the court-martial that convicted him, the board of officers that disagreed with such finding, the reports of the committees, and the remarks of the gentlemen who have made such careful study.

The fact that his restoration "will place Fitz-John Porter back upon the honored roll of the nation's defenders as a colonel in the Army of the United States of the same grade and rank held by him at the time of his dismissal" and "place him at the head of all the loyal, faithful, and gray-haired colonels" is no argument against the bill if he was unjustly dismissed. If by reason of such injustice the "loyal, faithful, and gray-haired colonels" were advanced in grade, the removal of such injustice now will but restore them to the position from which they were advanced by reason of such unjust decision. If "his justification and vindication will be the conviction and condemnation of the court that tried and sentenced him," a failure to so justify and vindicate him will be the conviction and condemnation of the board which subsequently acquitted him in a report which wound up by saying that—

Porter's faithful, subordinate, and intelligent conduct that afternoon saved the Union Army from defeat which would otherwise have resulted that day from the enemy's more speedy concentration.

If the justification of Porter will be a reflection upon the sacred memory of Abraham Lincoln—as is claimed by gentlemen upon this floor, who do not hesitate to open the tomb to bolster up their position upon this question—what a reflection it must be upon that other great American whose proud achievements are equally the cherished legacies of our children. Both were distinguished leaders—grand in their respective spheres. Neither need be pulled down to exalt the other, and I would as unhesitatingly regard, respect, and prefer the judgment of the one in civil affairs as I would that of the other in matters military. And it can not be construed in any sense as a reflection upon the judgment, ability, and integrity of Mr. Lincoln to claim that Grant's great military experience made him a better judge of the merits of this case than was Mr. Lincoln. But it has been said by way of explanation of General Grant's change of sentiment that it is one of the characteristics of the human race to mellow and soften with age—to look more charitably upon our fellow-creatures, and regard more kindly the weaknesses and short-comings of others as age moves upon us. I would be glad to feel assured that this feeling is natural and universal. It would be a grand thing to know that we shall leave behind us the bitter resentments of life as we approach the portals of death. We have, to be sure, in favor of this theory the word of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK], but he will pardon me for saying that in his able and masterly speech of opposition I can find no evidence that this noble sentiment has yet found lodgment in his heart.

If the gentlemen who signed the minority report upon this bill now pending, from which report I quote, "are convinced, from careful and patient examination and study of the evidence on the trial before the court-martial and of the statements made before the Schofield board, the case stood substantially the same before the board that it did before the court," why insist upon the infallibility of the court-martial and pay no regard to the findings of the Schofield board, when, as these gentlemen say, 'the case stood substantially the same?" That board, too, "was composed of some of the ablest generals and some of the clearest and most logical minds of their day." If the case stood substantially the same, why dwell upon the assertion that the chief witnesses were not living and not accessible? If such witnesses were not living and not accessible at the hearing before the board, is it not fair to assume that this was as disadvantageous to Porter as to the Government?

If it be now claimed that "that board had no legal existence," why was it convened? Was Porter's guilt or innocence to be ascertained or were members of the court-martial to be tried, and was the legal existence of the board to be called in question only in the event of a finding favorable to Porter? I shall not undertake to argue the question of legality of that board or the constitutionality of this measure against those whose experience teaches them that "the ingenuity of man never framed a law but the ingenuity of another could twist around it;" but looking at it from the standpoint of the ordinary mortal, it seems cold-blooded to pile up the Constitution as an obstacle to a man who I believe is seeking but simple justice and whose tireless efforts wring from the minority committee the expression, "We can but yield a certain tribute of respect to the indomitable persistence with which he has pursued the one object of his life for twenty-three years. Twenty-three years has this man been imploring and appealing for justice. Year after year has he come here asking for a hearing of a Congress and an administration opposed to him politically, not waiting until a party came into power with which he had political sympathy, pleading only to be heard and petitioning that his case be not made a party matter.

I have not seen General Porter for nearly a quarter of a century. They tell me that he is a bent, bowed, decrepit man—aged prematurely in the unequal struggle of one man against the unreasonable prejudice of a nation. I remember him only as the strong, able soldier who directed us at Gaines's Mill, at Malvern, and in those terrible seven days' battles in front of Richmond, where the courage, fidelity, and valor of Porter and his troops saved the Union army. It is not Porter nor the appeal of his friends that influence my action in this matter. I approached the examination of this case prejudiced against him like thousands of others before I had fully examined it. My study of the case turned the bias in his favor, and I have read the minority report against him and listened to or read every speech thus far made in opposition, and I can not and will not by voting against this bill war against my convictions—the judgment of which may be assailed but their integrity never. I dare not violate a conscience which will always be with me.

And I regret that upon this question I part company with many political friends, whose motives I do not impugn, whose sincerity I do not question, but whose conclusions I can only explain as being based upon the theory that their favorable consideration will reflect upon some whose distinguished names are the heritage of the nation. Why need we consider this as a reflection upon any one? It seems to me that we may well and properly conclude that an unreasoning sentiment and unreasonable prejudice which was prevalent in those days prevented that calm consideration which the spirit of our laws accords to the meanest criminal. Who knows but that the military necessities of the situation required just such an arbitrary act—to sacrifice one for the good of the many. Only those who served in the Peninsula campaign can realize or comprehend that intense McClellanism which pervaded that Army of the Potomac in 1862. McClellan was our first love, whom we worshiped with the enthusiasm of youth and with a feeling akin to idolatry.

Neither Grant nor Sherman, nor yet dashing Phil. Sheridan, with all their wonderful abilities and unexampled successes, held that enthusiastic esteem in the hearts of their followers as did McClellan in the early days of the war. That feeling—that spirit of McClellanism, capable of being used to such great advantage, worthy and desirous if so used—was nevertheless a great obstacle to the success of the Army with another commander to lead it, and that spirit needed extinction, even if by arbitrary acts an innocent man should suffer. It is a cruel theory, but as Sherman has pithily expressed it, "War is a cruelty and can not be refined." This is not the only act of injustice and cruelty which the secret history of that war contains, and which for the sake of humanity I pray may never be exposed to public view. The pathway of those four years of war is strewn with blasted hopes, broken hearts, and wrecked humanity, because of the exercise of that arbitrary power so revolting and abhorrent and which only the military necessity can justify.

But, sir, when that necessity passes away—as fortunately for us it has—leaving the blessings of the present and the hopes and anticipation of the future to repair and obliterate the ravages of the past, we should eagerly hasten to right the wrongs, so far as it is in our power, and heal the wounds necessarily inflicted upon friends while pursuing the foe. And in this case it seems to me that instead of subscribing to the doctrine that Porter should have been shot, we should thank that Providence so eloquently invoked by a gentleman on this floor that it is still within the power of this mighty nation to do justice to the living. These are a few of the reasons why I intend to vote for this bill, and while I shall not conceal my regret that so many of my party associates see fit to oppose it, I do not hesitate to express my satisfaction that upon this question my judgment is in entire harmony with my sympathies, and the sacred memories of my comrades at Gaines's Mill and Malvern are happily blended and in harmonious accord with the belief that my duty, measured by my oath as a member and my conscience as a man, demands the most earnest of my humble efforts to obtain justice for my old division and corps commander, General Fitz-John Porter. [Applause.]

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. RICHARDSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration, by special order, the bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

To Mr. MCADOO, for five days, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. LONG, for six days, on account of important business.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 18, 1886.

Prayer by Bishop E. G. ANDREWS, D. D., of the city of Washington.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received yesterday from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

A bill (H. R. 4177) to reduce the fee on domestic money-orders for sums not exceeding $5; and

A bill (H. R. 4415) to make the allowance for clerk-hire to postmasters of the first and second class post-offices cover the cost of clerical labor in the money-order business, and for other purposes.

The bill (H. R. 129) to protect homestead settlers within railway limits, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of 26 ex-Union soldiers, praying for the passage of a bill embodying the recommendations of the national pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRISON presented the petition of M. L. Spencer and 50 other citizens of Huntington County, Indiana, praying for the passage of a joint resolution submitting to the several State Legislatures an amendment to the Constitution to protect women in the enjoyment of the right of suffrage on equal terms with men; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Ira Miller, late a private in the Fifteenth and Seventeenth Regiments Indiana Volunteers, praying that he be granted an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of the Rock Bound Assembly, Knights of Labor, of Vinal Haven, Me., praying the passage of the bill (H. R. 1914) relating to the wages of printers in the Government Printing Office; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a petition of the quarterly meeting of Orthodox Friends assembled at Damascus, Ohio, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 355) to promote peace among nations and for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CALL. I present a petition of J. J. Delaney, president; W. D. Cash, first vice-president; E. Canals, second vice-president; George W. Allen, third vice-president: William Curry, and other members of the board of governors of the Board of Trade at Key West, Fla. The petition is as follows:

> The Board of Trade of the port of Key West, Fla., respectfully asks the enactment of a law providing that signal stations be established at Point Jupiter (Jupiter Inlet) and Fort Jefferson, Tortugas, Florida, to be connected with Key West by telegraph; looping in Sand Key light-house, which is in direct line, and could be arranged with very little if any extra expense.
>
> In our opinion this will be of great benefit to commerce.
>
> All vessels from the Gulf of Mexico to ports on the east coast of North America and to Europe pass within signaling distance of Tortugas and Sand Key and nearly all steamers from the east coast of North America on their way to ports in the Gulf pass within signaling distance of Point Jupiter.
>
> These vessels after reaching Tortugas on their way north encounter the most dangerous part of the Florida reef, which continues nearly to Jupiter, and coming south pass along this line of dangerous reefs from Jupiter to Tortugas.
> Vessels should be warned when entering these reefs from either station. Key West is the nearest port to these points, and is connected with Cuba and South America and the mainland of Florida by cable and is a signal station, and is the only point from which assistance to vessels in distress on the Florida reefs can be speedily had, and great saving to property and oftentimes to life would result by timely information of vessels in distress conveyed by telegraph from these points.

The petitioners therefore urge this subject upon the early consideration of Congress. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I present the petition of Sigmond Roman, administrator of A. Gugenheim, in which he states that the recent French and American Claims Commission expired without time for the proper and legal consideration of a number of claims of great magnitude, which by reason of the large amount involved and the character of proof required were necessarily crowded to the heel of the docket, and instead of the causes being considered on their respective merits they were dismissed with a decree of a single line—that the commission was without jurisdiction, &c. The petitioner desires some relief, and suggests in his petition that perhaps the best relief would be to have the Governments of France and the United States agree to an enlargement of the time. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I present a number of petitions quite largely signed by citizens of the United States, praying for the abolition of the Presidency. I judge from the names and the handwriting in which they are written that many of the signers of the petitions must be citizens of foreign birth; but the form of petition indicates that the gentlemen who have prepared it have given a great deal of thought and study to this question, both in the matter of history and the matter of political philosophy; and they set forth the abuses which have existed, or which they believe exist, in the present condition of things. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The ordinary entry in the Journal should be that the prayer of the petitioner be denied, instead of postponing the petition, I suggest to my friend.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred the bill (S. 145) for the relief of James Bainter and the bill (S. 146) for the relief of George S. Comstock, submitted adverse reports thereon, and moved their indefinite postponement.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that the two bills just reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse reports of the committee.

Mr. GRAY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 211) for the relief of Wetmore & Brother, of Saint Louis, Mo., reported adversely thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 472) for the relief of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, Rev. Worcester Willey, and Esther Smith, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. 1568) to authorize Commander John W. Philip, United States Navy, to accept a silver pitcher tendered him by the Government of the United States of Colombia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 244) for the relief of Mary F. Potts, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred in executive session a letter of the Attorney-General, with authority to report in open session, to make a report, concluding with sundry resolutions, which I ask may be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reports certain resolutions. Does the Senator desire to have them read?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] wishes to give a notice in reference to the report.

Mr. PUGH. On behalf of the minority of the committee from which the report has just been made, I desire to state that we knew nothing of the contents of the report until it was read to the committee this morning. The minority desire to prepare a report, in which they will present their views; and to enable them to do so we ask to have until Monday a week within which to prepare the report. We wish to have it now understood that the majority report and the resolutions accompanying it will not be called up for consideration until we get leave to file the minority report, and that the time given us to do so is not to extend beyond next Monday week.

Mr. DAWES. Can not we have the resolutions read so that everybody may see them in the RECORD?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks for the reading of the resolutions. They will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the minority of the committee will be considered as granted, if there be no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there a report accompanying the resolutions?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the report be printed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; it will be printed under the rule. I ask that the report of the committee, as well as the resolutions which have been read, be printed in the RECORD, as it will be in demand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

The report is as follows:

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report on the letter from the Attorney-General of the United States declining to transmit to the Senate copies of official records and papers concerning the administration of the office of the district attorney of the southern district of Alabama:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred a letter from the Attorney-General of the United States declining to transmit to the Senate copies of official records and papers concerning the administration of the office of the district attorney of the southern district of Alabama from January 1, 1885, to January 25, 1886, respectfully reports:

That on the 17th July, 1885, the President of the United States, pursuant to the provisions of section 1768 of the Revised Statutes, suspended George M. Duskin from the execution of the duties of the office of district attorney of said district by an order in the following words:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, D. C., July 17, 1885.

SIR: You are hereby suspended from the office of attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, in accordance with the terms of section 1768, Revised Statutes of the United States, and subject to all provisions of law applicable thereto.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

To GEORGE M. DUSKIN, Esq.,
United States Attorney, Mobile, Ala.

And on the same day, pursuant to the same statute, designated John D. Burnett to perform the duties of such suspended officer in the mean time by a letter of authority in the words following:

GROVER CLEVELAND, President of the United States of America, to all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye, that by virtue of the authority conferred upon the President by section 1768 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, I do hereby suspend George M. Duskin, of Alabama, from the office of attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama until the end of the next session of the Senate; and I hereby designate John D. Burnett, of Alabama, to perform the duties of such suspended officer in the mean time, he being a suitable person therefor; subject to all provisions of law applicable thereto.

In testimony whereof I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand at the city of Washington, the 17th day of July, A. D. 1885, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and tenth.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

[SEAL.]

By the President:

T. F. BAYARD,
Secretary of State.

On the 14th December, 1885, the Senate then being in session, the President nominated the same John D. Burnett to be attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama in the place of the said Duskin, suspended, in the following words:

"I nominate John D. Burnett, of Alabama, to be attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, vice George M. Duskin, suspended.

"GROVER CLEVELAND."

This nomination was in due course referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Since the passage of the act of 2d March, 1867, "regarding the tenure of certain civil offices," it has been the practice of the Committee on the Judiciary whenever a nomination has been made proposing the removal from office of one person and the appointment of another to address a note to the head of the Department having such matters in charge (usually the Attorney-General), asking that all papers and information in the possession of the Department touching the conduct and administration of the officer proposed to be removed and touching the character and conduct of the person proposed to be appointed be sent to the committee for its information. This practice has through all administrations been carried on with the unanimous approval of all the members of the committee, although the composition of the committee has been during this period sometimes of one political character and sometimes of another. In no instance, until this time, has the committee met with any delay or denial in respect of furnishing such papers and information, with a single exception, and in which exception the delay and suggested denial lasted for only two or three days.

The committee has thus hitherto been enabled to know the character and quality of the administration of the office in charge of the incumbent proposed to be removed as well as the character and quality of the person proposed to be appointed, so far as the papers in the Department could furnish information in regard thereto.

In the instance now particularly under consideration the committee, according to its standing course, on December 26, 1885, through its chairman, addressed a note to the Attorney-General in the same form and asking for the same papers and information that it had been accustomed to do. After sundry delays and explanations it became evident to the committee that it could not by this informal method obtain an inspection of the papers and documents in the Department of Justice bearing upon the subject. It accordingly, on the 25th of January, 1886, reported to the Senate for its adoption a resolution in the following words:

"Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States of the southern district of Alabama."

which on the next day was adopted by the Senate without a division.

The Attorney-General, on the 1st day of February, 1886, sent to the Senate a communication in the following words:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, January 28, 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate of the United States:

I acknowledge the receipt of a resolution of the Senate, adopted on the 25th instant in executive session, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States of the southern district of Alabama."

In response to the said resolution the President of the United States directs me to say that the papers which were in this Department relating to the fitness of John D. Burnett, recently nominated to said office, having been already sent to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and the papers and documents which are mentioned in the said resolution and still remaining in the custody of this Department, having exclusive reference to the suspension by the President of George M. Duskin, the late incumbent of the office of district attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, it is not considered that the public interest will be promoted by a compliance with said resolution and the transmission of the papers and documents therein mentioned to the Senate in executive session.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. H. GARLAND, Attorney-General.

This letter, although in response to the direction of the Senate that copies of any papers bearing on the subject within a given period of time be transmitted, assumes that the Attorney-General of the United States is the servant of the President, and is to give or withhold copies of documents in his office according to the will of the Executive and not otherwise.

Your committee is unable to discover, either in the original act of 1789 creating the office of Attorney-General or in the act of 1870 creating the Department of Justice, any provision which makes the Attorney-General of the United States in any sense the servant of or controlled by the Executive in the performance of the duties imputed to him by law or the nature of his office. It is true that in the creation of the Department of State, of War, and of the Navy it was provided in substance that these Secretaries should perform such duties as should from time to time be enjoined upon them by the President, and should conduct the business of their Departments in such manner as the President should direct, but the committee does not think it important to the main question under consideration that such direction is not to be found in the statute creating the Department of Justice, for it is thought it must be obvious that the authority intrusted by the statute in these cases to the President to direct and control the performance of duties was only a superintending authority to regulate the performance of the duties that the law required, and not to require the performance of duties that the laws had not devolved upon the heads of Departments, and not to dispense with or forbid the performance of such duties according as it might suit the discretion or the fancy of the Executive. The Executive is bound by the Constitution and by his oath to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and he is himself as much bound by the regulations of law as the humblest officer in the service of the United States, and he can not have authority to undertake to faithfully execute the laws, whether applied to his own special functions or those of the Departments created by law, otherwise than by causing, so far as he lawfully may and by lawful methods, the heads of Departments and other officers of the United States to do the duties which the law, and not his will, has imputed to them.

The important question, then, is whether it is within the constitutional competence of either House of Congress to have access to the official papers and documents in the various public offices of the United States created by laws enacted by themselves. It may be fully admitted that, except in respect of the Department of the Treasury, there is no statute which commands the head of any Department to transmit to either House of Congress on its demand any information whatever concerning the administration of his Department; but the committee believes it to be clear that from the very nature of the powers intrusted by the Consitution to the two Houses of Congress it is a necessary incident that either House must have at all times the right to know all that officially exists or takes place in any of the Departments of the Government. So perfectly was this proposition understood before and at the time of the formation of the Consitution, that the Continental Congress, before the adoption of the present Constitution, in establishing a department of foreign affairs and providing for a principal officer thereof, thought it fit to enact that all books, records, and other papers in that office should be open to the inspection of any member of Congress, provided that no copy should be taken of matters of secret nature without special leave of Congress. It was not thought necessary to enact that the Congress itself should be entitled to the production and inspection of such papers, for that right was supposed to exist in the very nature of things; and when under the Constitution the Department came to be created, although the provision that each individual member of Congress should have access to the papers was omitted (evidently for reasons that can now be quite well understood) it was not thought necessary that an affirmative provision should be inserted giving to the Houses of Congress the right to know the contents of the public papers and records in the public offices of the country whose laws and whose offices they were to assist in creating.

It is believed that there is no instance of civilized governments having bodies representative of the people or of states in which the right and the power of those representative bodies to obtain in one form or another complete information as to every paper and transaction in any of the executive departments thereof does not exist even though such papers might relate to what is ordinarily an executive function, if that function impinged upon any duty or function of the representative bodies. A qualification of this general right may under our Consitution exist in the case of calls by the House of Representatives for papers relating to treaties, &c., under consideration and not yet disposed of by the President and Senate.

The committee feels authorized to state, after a somewhat careful research, that within the foregoing limits there is scarcely in the history of this Government until now any instance of a refusal by a head of a Department, or even of the President himself, to communicate official facts and information as distinguished from private and unofficial papers, motions, views, reasons, and opinions, to either House of Congress when unconditionally demanded. Indeed the early Journals of the Senate show great numbers of instances of directions to the heads of Departments, as of course, to furnish papers and reports upon all sorts of affairs both legislative and executive.

The instances of requests to the President and commands to the heads of Departments by each House of Congress from those days until now for papers and information on every conceivable subject of public affairs are almost innumerable; for it appears to have been thought by all the Presidents who have carried on the Government now for almost a century that even in respect of requests to them, an independent and co-ordinate branch of the Government, they were under a constitutional duty and obligation to furnish to either House the papers called for, unless, as has happened in very rare instances, when the request was coupled with an appeal to the discretion of the President in respect of the danger of publicity to send the papers if in his judgment it should not be incompatible with the public welfare.

Even in times of the highest party excitement and stress, as in 1826 and 1844, it did not seem to occur to the Chief Executive of the United States that it was possible that any official facts or information existing either in the Departments created by law or within his own possession could, save as before stated, be withheld from either of the Houses of Congress, although such facts or information sometimes involved very intricate and delicate matters of foreign affairs, as well as sometimes the history and conduct of officers connected with the administration of affairs. Thus in 1826, when the Senate thought fit to pass a resolution that in considering whether the United States should be represented in the congress of Panama the Senate ought to act with open doors, unless the publication of the documents referred to in debate would be prejudicial to existing negotiations, and that the President be requested to inform the Senate whether such objection existed to the publication of the documents communicated by the Executive, and, if so, to specify the parts which would for that reason be objectionable. The President replied that all the communications had been made to the Senate in confidence, and proceeded to say: "Believing that the established free, confidential communication between the Executive and the Senate ought for the public interest to be preserved unimpaired, I deem it my indispensable duty to leave to the Senate itself the decision of the question involving a departure, hitherto, so far as I am informed, without example, from that usage, and upon the motives for which, not being informed of them, I do not feel myself competent to decide;" and although in this instance there was no question in regard to the furnishing documents or papers and the question was merely whether the Executive was bound to give an opinion to the Senate in such a case, twenty out of the forty-four Senators present appear to have voted on the yeas and nays for the proposition that the President in such a case was bound to give such an opinion to the Senate. Among those twenty were Senators Benton, Cobb, Dickerson, Hayne, King, Macon, Randolph, Van Buren, and Woodbury, and by a vote of 27 to 16 the Senate declared that it had "the right to publish communications so made and discuss the same with open doors without the consent of the President when, in their opinion, the public interest may require such publication and such discussion."

In 1842 the House of Representatives charged the select committee to inquire into the cause, manner, and circumstances of the removal of one H. H. Sylvester, late a clerk in the Pension Office, with power to send for persons and papers. On the 27th of July, 1842, Mr. Garrett Davis reported to the House upon the subject, stating that the committee had requested the Secretary to furnish for its use a copy of the charges against Sylvester and a copy of the order dismissing him and copies of any other papers in the Department touching his removal. He quotes from the response of the Secretary as follows:

"The letter dismissing Mr. Sylvester was made a public record of the Department, and I therefore transmit a copy of it herewith, agreeably to your request. There is no other paper of the description specified in your request or relating to the subject on the files of this Department, nor is there any in my possession which is not of a confidential character. The faithful discharge of the duties devolving upon heads of Departments frequently renders it of essential importance to preserve confidential communications he has received as such, and private honor as well as public policy forbids that a pledge thus given should be violated."

Everything in the files was produced without question. The House adjourned soon after this report, and no final action was taken upon the subject. This report is so valuable as a discussion of the general questions connected with patronage that the committee think it fit to append it to this report (Appendix B). It will be seen in this instance that there was no attempt on the part of the Secretary to deny the right of the House to have the inspection of all papers in the files of the Department, but he only put himself upon the ground that private and confidential communications that were not on the files of the Department ought not to be disclosed. On the 18th May, 1844, the Senate in executive session adopted a resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to communicate whether any and what sums of money had been drawn from the Treasury to carry into effect the orders of the War and Navy Departments made since the 12th April of that year for increasing the military force on the frontiers of Texas, &c. On 28th of same month President Tyler sent a message to the Senate stating that the Secretary had communicated the Senate resolution to him. He then says:

"While I can not recognise this call thus made on the head of the Department as consistent with the constitutional rights of the Senate when acting in its executive capacity, which in such case can only properly hold correspondence with the President of the United States, nevertheless from an anxious desire to lay before the Senate all such information as may be necessary to enable it, with full understanding, to act upon any subject which may be before it, I herewith transmit communications which have been made to me by the Secretaries of War and Navy Departments in full answer to the resolution of the Senate."

In this instance it will be seen that there is no intimation of a denial of the right of either House of Congress in the exercise of its general jurisdiction to have knowledge of papers in and acts of a Department of the Government, but only a claim that when such papers are wanted in the "executive capacity" of the Senate they ought to be called for from the President direct. It must be supposed that President Tyler was ignorant of the fact that such commands to heads of Departments had been made by the Senate continuously from the foundation of the Government down to that time, and that those commands had been obeyed, or else he must have supposed that an unbroken and unchanged practice of the Senate under the Constitution for more than half a century had been under a plainly erroneous impression of its rights not only by itself, but by the Executive Departments of the Government. It would seem to be too clear for argument that whether the Senate chooses to conduct its business with closed doors or open doors is a matter entirely for its consideration and can have no relation to the obligation of the Executive Departments of the Government to respond to its call for papers or information.

On the 22d May of the same year the Senate, on motion of Mr. Benton, requested the President to inform the Senate whether any engagement or agreement had taken place between the President of the United States and the president of Texas in relation to naval or military aid, or any other aid, and, if so, to communicate all the particulars and copies of the same, if in writing, and a copy of all communications on the subject; which information was furnished.

On 28th of May of the same year a similar resolution was passed calling for a copy of the instructions given in 1829 by President Jackson through the Secretary of State to the United States minister at Mexico on the subject of Texas; which was furnished.

On the same 28th of May, 1844, on motion by Mr. Benton, the Senate called on the President for "the whole of the private letter from London, with its date, quoted by the American Secretary of State" in a letter of his to the United States chargés d'affaires in Texas, together with the name of the writer of the private letter. Which information was supplied without protest.

Numerous other instances occurred about the same time of similar requests and similar compliances too numerous indeed to justify insertion in this report.

The fact that the executive Journals of the Senate have only been made public and printed down to the year 1828, and the written Journals since that time are not indexed, makes it difficult to find all the instances of calls on the President and heads of Departments for information and papers that have occurred since that date, but the committee feel safe in stating from the research it has made that the course of the Government has been constant and continuous and unchanged from the beginning until now, and that, in its belief, no instance within the principles and limitations before stated has occurred in which calls for official papers and files addressed either to the President in the form of requests or to the heads of Departments in the form of commands which have not been complied with, but it has sometimes happened where the request to the President was merely a conditional one, leaving it to his discretion whether the papers should be communicated or not, that they have not been communicated.

On the 6th of December, 1866, when there was much irritation existing between the Houses of Congress and the Executive, the House of Representatives adopted a resolution directing the Postmaster-General to communicate to the House information of all the postmasters removed from office between the 28th of July, 1866, and said 6th of December, together with the reasons or causes of such removals, and the names of all persons appointed in their places, &c. This command was, on the 18th of February, 1867, complied with by the Postmaster-General without in the least degree questioning the right of the House of Representatives to have that information.

Two instances occurring during the administration of President Hayes, under circumstances when there would be naturally a disposition on the part of the Executive to stand upon his constitutional rights, may be of interest. On the 9th of January, 1879, the Senate passed a resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit charges on file against the supervising inspector-general of steamboats and the papers connected therewith; which was also promptly complied with.

At the same session a similar resolution called for papers on file in the Treasury Department "showing why Lieutenant Devereux was removed from the revenue-marine service," which was also complied with.

But it would seem to be needless to array further precedents out of the vast mass that exists in the Journals of the Houses covering probably every year of the existence of the Government. The practical construction of the Constitution in these respects by all branches of the Government for so long a period would seem upon acknowledged principles to settle what are the rights and powers of the two Houses of Congress in the exercise of their respective duties covering every branch of the operations of the Government, and it is submitted with confidence that such rights and powers are indispensable to the discharge of their duties and do not infringe any right of the Executive, and that it does not belong to either heads of Departments or to the President himself to take into consideration any supposed motives or purposes that either House may have in calling for such papers, or whether their possession or knowledge of their contents could be applied by either House to useful purposes.

The Constitution of the United States was adopted in the light of the well-known history that even ministers of the English Crown were bound to lay before Parliament all papers when demanded on pain of the instant dismissal of such ministers on refusal, through the rapid and effectual instrumentality of a vote of want of confidence. And the Continental Congress had for more than ten years itself governed the country and had control of all papers and records, not by reason of anything expressed in the Articles of Confederation, but by reason of the intrinsic nature of free government. The jurisdiction of the two Houses of Congress to legislate and the power to advise or withhold advice concerning treaties and appointments necessarily involves the jurisdiction to officially know every step and action of the officers of the law and all the facts touching their conduct in the possession of any Department or even in the possession of the President himself. There was no need to express such a power, for it was necessarily an inherent incident to the exercise of the powers granted.

It will be observed that in this instance the call for papers covered a period of more than six months, during which the regular incumbent of the office had been discharging its duties, and also the further period of more than six months, during which the person designated to discharge those duties on suspension of the officer had been acting, and that that person is the one now proposed to be appointed to the place.

It will also be observed that the President has not undertaken to remove the incumbent of the office, but has only, in expressed and stated pursuance of the statutes on the subject, suspended that officer, and that the same statutes expressly provide that such officer shall not be removed without the advice and consent of the Senate and that, if that advice and consent be not given, the incumbent would (unless his regular term of office should have previously expired) at the close of this session of the Senate be restored to the lawful right to exercise its duties. The Senate, then, by this nomination is asked to advise and consent to the removal of the incumbent and to the appointment of the candidate proposed for his place. In exercising its duty in respect of these questions it is plain that the conduct and management of the incumbent is a matter absolutely essential to be known to the Senate, in order that it may determine whether it can rightly advise his removal or rightly leave him to resume the functions of his office at the end of its session, as well as whether the candidate proposed has in the exercise of the office under his designation so conducted himself as to show that he is competent and faithful. Indeed it may be stated with entire accuracy that even in the case of a vacancy in an office and the proposed filling of such vacancy it is important for the Senate to know the previous condition and management of the office, the state of its affairs; whether there have been cases of misconduct or abuse of powers, the embezzlement of money, and indeed all the circumstances bearing upon its administration, in order that it may judge of the suitableness of appointing a particular person to take up its duties with reference to the difficulties that may exist in its affairs, the state of the accounts, and everything concerning its administration, so as to measure the fitness and competency of the particular candidate to meet the emergencies of the case.

It appears from the table herewith submitted (Appendix A) that out of about fourteen hundred and eighty-five nominations sent to the Senate during the first thirty days of this session, that is from the first Monday in December, 1885, to the 5th of January, 1886, six hundred and forty-three were nominations of persons proposed to be appointed in the place of officers suspended and proposed to be removed (and of whom it is known that some are soldiers), and in respect of whom the action of the Senate in advising and consenting to the proposed appointment would effect a removal and in respect of whom the failure of the Senate to advise and consent to such removals and appointments the effect would be to restore them to the possession of their offices at the end of the session except in cases in which the terms of some of them should have previously expired.

Is it not desirable and necessary to the proper performance of its duties and in every aspect of the public interest that the simple facts in regard to what the conduct of these officials as well as in regard to what the conduct of the persons designated to perform their duties has been should be made known to the Senate? Have these suspended officials or any considerable number of them been guilty of misconduct in office or of any personal conduct making them unworthy to be longer trusted with the performance of duties imposed upon them by law? If they have, it would seem to be clear that every consideration of public interest and of public duty would require that the facts should be made known, in order that the Senate may understandingly and promptly advise their removal, and that the most careful scrutiny should be had in respect of selecting their successors, as well as in respect of providing better means and safeguards by legislation for administering the laws of the United States.

Such information, it would seem, the Executive is determined the Senate shall not possess, for the alleged reason that it might enable the Senate to understand what circumstances connected with the faithful execution of the laws induced the President to exercise the discretion the statute confers upon him to suspend them and ask the Senate to unite with him in their removal from office. A similar result would follow in respect of the knowledge of any and every step in the transactions of the Government; for instance, the President, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, has as large discretion as he has in the suspension of civil officers, but on the theory suggested by the Attorney-General both the President and the Secretary of War would be justified in refusing to either House of Congress copies of papers and documents relating to the administration of the Department of War and the disposition of the troops, &c., for the reason that, the facts being disclosed, the two Houses of Congress might be enabled to comprehend the reasons and motives actuating the Executive in his conduct as Commander-in-Chief.

Reduced to its simplest form the proposition would be that neither the President nor the head of a Department is bound to communicate any official papers to either House of Congress which might draw into question in the minds of its members or of the people the wisdom or fairness of his acts. But the committee is of the opinion that in matters of this nature the Senate has little concern with the reasons or motives either of the heads of Departments or of the Executive, but it has large concern that its own reasons and grounds of action should rest upon and be drawn from the solid truth. The Senate, if it does its duty and preserves the independence that belongs to it, must act upon its own reasons and judgment and not upon those of the President, however valuable they may be. If the truth regarding the conduct of these officials and designated persons were known, the question for the Senate would be not what were the reasons or motives of the Executive, but whether the facts themselves, as they took place, would furnish it with sufficient reason for giving or withholding its advice and consent to the proposed changes.

Another view of the matter is not, as the committee thinks, without large importance to the public interest at this time. The President, in his last annual message and in connection with the subject of removing the ordinary administration of the laws and the selection of public agents from the arena of mere party politics, stated:

"I am inclined to think that there is no sentiment more general in the minds of the people of our country than a conviction of the correctness of the principle upon which the law enforcing civil-service reform is based. In its present condition the law regulates only a part of the subordinate public positions throughout the country. It applies the test of fitness to applicants for these places by means of a competitive examination, and gives a large discretion to the commissioners as to the character of the examination and many other matters connected with its execution. Thus the rules and regulations adopted by the commission have much to do with the practical usefulness of the statute and with the results of its application.

"The people may well trust the commission to execute the law with perfect fairness and with as little irritation as is possible. But of course no relaxation of the principle which underlies it, and no weakening of the safeguards which surround it can be expected. Experience in its administration will probably suggest amendment of the methods of its execution, but I venture to hope that we shall never again be remitted to the system which distributes public positions purely as rewards for partisan service. Doubts may well be entertained whether our Government could survive the strain of a continuance of this system, which upon every change of administration inspires an immense army of claimants for office to lay siege to the patronage of Government, engrossing the time of public officers with their importunities, spreading abroad the contagion of their disappointment, and filling the air with the tumult of their discontent.

"The allurements of an immense number of offices and places exhibited to the voters of the land, and the promise of their bestowal in recognition of partisan activity, debauch the suffrage and rob political action of its thoughful and deliberative character. The evil would increase with the multiplication of offices consequent upon our extension, and the mania for office-holding, growing from its indulgence, would pervade our population so generally that patriotic purpose, the support of principle, the desire for the public good, and solicitude for the nation's welfare, would be nearly banished from the activity of our party contests, and cause them to degenerate into ignoble, selfish, and disgraceful struggles for the possession of office and public place.

"Civil-service reform enforced by law came none too soon to check the progress of demoralization.

"One of its effects, not enough regarded, is the freedom it brings to the political action of those conservative and sober men who, in fear of the confusion and risk attending an arbitrary and sudden change in all the public offices with a change of party rule, cast their ballots against such a chance.

"Parties seem to be necessary, and will long continue to exist; nor can it be now denied that there are legitimate advantages, not disconnected with office-holding, which follow party supremacy. While partisanship continues bitter and pronounced, and supplies so much of motive to sentiment and action, it is not fair to hold public officials, in charge of important trusts, responsible for the best results in the performance of their duties, and yet insist that they shall rely, in confidential and important places, upon the work of those not only opposed to them in political affiliation, but so steeped in partisan prejudice and rancor that they have no loyalty to their chiefs and no desire for their success. Civil-service reform does not exact this, nor does it require that those in subordinate positions who fail in yielding their best service, or who are incompetent, should be retained simply because they are in place. The whining of a clerk discharged for indolence or incompetency, who, though he gained his place by the worst possible operation of the spoils system, suddenly discovers that he is entitled to protection under the sanction of civil-service reform, represents an idea no less absurd than the clamor of the applicant who claims the vacant position as his compensation for the most questionable party work.

"The civil-service law does not prevent the discharge of the indolent or incompetent clerk, but it does prevent supplying his place with the unfit party worker. Thus in both these phases is seen benefit to the public service. And the people who desire good government, having secured this statute, will not relinquish its benefits without protest. Nor are they unmindful of the fact that its full advantages can only be gained through the complete good faith of those having its execution in charge. And this they will insist upon."

This highly important and valuable official communication in the presence of six hundred and forty-three suspensions from office would seem to lead to the conclusion that this number of the civil officers of the United States selected to be suspended and removed had been so derelict in the performance of their functions or guilty of such personal misconduct as to put them in the category of unfaithful public servants deserving dismissal by the President and the Senate and the condemnation of their countrymen. In such a state of things we think that the common sense of justice and fair play that is so much prized, as we believe, by the people of the United States would require that in some way this large body of men should have an opportunity to know the substance of their alleged misdoings in order that they may either admit their guilt or, denying it, explain their conduct, or show that the accusations against them were selfish and wicked pretexts, and set up for the mere purpose of obtaining their suspension and ultimate dismissal from office in order that others less capable and worthy might at once receive the honors and emoluments of their places. It is known to every Senator that, so far as the Senate has had to do both with removals and appointments, it has for a great number of years been its practice, when any officer or person was before it for removal or appointment against whom any serious accusation has been made which would, if true, influence the action of the Senate in the case, to cause the person concerned to be informed of the substance of the complaint against him and give him an opportunity to defend himself; and it is also known that at this very session a very considerable number of instances of that kind have occurred and are daily occurring. If the Senate is proceeding upon a false principle in such instances, it is high time that its course in these respects should be reversed, and that hereafter it should act upon such accusations without any knowledge other than that derived from the accusers, and leave the victims of such injustice to console themselves with the reflection that all parties are now engaged in an effort to reform the Government.

Why should the facts, as they may appear from the papers on file, be suppressed? Is it because that, being brought to light, it would appear that malice and misrepresentation and perjury are somewhat abundant, or merely that faithful and competent and honorable officers have been suspended and are proposed to be removed, under the advice and consent of the Senate, in order that places may be found for party men because they are party men or are the special objects of party favor?

How does it happen in this time of suggested reform and purer methods in government that for the first time it is thought important that the historic and administrative facts relating to the official and personal conduct of officers of the United States should be withheld and that the administration of the Government should proceed with a secrecy and mystery as great as in the days of the Star Chamber?

The high respect and consideration that the Senate must always have for the executive office would make it reluctant to adopt either theory. But at present the impenetrable veil remains, and as the committee is unable to suggest any other solution of the riddle, it must leave it until this veil is lifted and the operations of the Government shall again be known.

In this state of things the committee feels it to be its clear duty to report for the consideration of the Senate and for adoption the following resolutions, namely:

Resolved, That the foregoing report of the Committee on the Judiciary be agreed to and adopted.

Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its condemnation of the refusal of the Attorney-General, under whatever influence, to send to the Senate copies of papers called for by its resolution of the 25th of January and set forth in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary as in violation of his official duty and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof.

Resolved, That it is, under these circumstances, the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals of officers the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct of whom are withheld by the Executive or any head of a Department when deemed necessary by the Senate and called for in considering the matter.

Resolved, That the provision of section 1754 of the Revised Statutes declaring—

"That persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such office ought to be faithfully and fully put in execution, and that to remove, or to propose to remove, any such soldier whose faithfulness, competency, and character are above reproach and to give place to another who has not rendered such service is a violation of the spirit of the law and of the practical gratitude the people and Government of the United States owe to the defenders of constitutional liberty and the integrity of the Government."

All of which is respectfully submitted.

APPENDIX B.

[House Report No. 945, Twenty-seventh Congress, second session. Removal from office of Henry H. Sylvester. To accompany Senate bill No. 549. July 27, 1842; laid upon the table.]

Mr. Garrett Davis, from the select committee appointed on the subject, made the following report:

The select committee charged by the House to inquire into "the cause, manner, and circumstances of the removal of Henry H. Sylvester, late a clerk in the Pension Office, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report by bill, resolution, or otherwise," have performed the duties assigned to them, and beg leave to report as follows:

Mr. Sylvester having been removed by Hon. John C. Spencer, Secretary of War, your committee thought it was proper to notify him of their proceedings, and therefore directed its chairman to inform him of the readiness of the committee to receive any communication which he might desire to make to it, to summon and take the testimony of any witnesses he might wish to have examined, and to invite him to attend its meetings. In reply, the honorable Secretary informed the chairman that he did "not desire to make any communication to the committee, or to have any witnesses summoned by it, or to attend its meetings."

The committee then made a request in writing of the Secretary to furnish for its use "a copy of the charges preferred against Henry H. Sylvester; also a copy of the order or letter dismissing him from office, and copies of any other papers in the Department touching his removal."

In his response the Secretary says: "The letter dismissing Mr. Sylvester was made a public record of the Department, and I therefore transmit a copy of it herewith agreeably to your request. There is no other paper of the description specified in your request, or relating to the subject, on the files of this Department, nor is there any in my possession which is not of a confidential character." "The faithful discharge of the duties devolved upon the heads of Departments frequently renders it of essential importance to preserve as confidential communications made and received as such, and private honor as well as public policy forbids that a pledge thus given should be violated."

This reply of the honorable Secretary evinces somewhat more of interest in this proceeding; and, though he argues his positions with great earnestness, your committee are constrained to protest against them, as unjust, impolitic, and immoral. What are they, but that the secret charges of concealed informers, however false and calumnious in fact, and from whatever selfish, impure, and dishonorable motives made, even after they have effected the nefarious purpose of removing a faithful officer, who, indeed, may be above all exception, officially and personally, are still of so important and sacred a character that "private honor as well as public policy" forbids that they should be revealed to a committee of the House, raised for the purpose of investigating the cause of the removal of the particular officer.

Are we under a despotism, where the best officers of the Government are to be struck down—by, they know not whom, and for, they know not what? And does the honorable Secretary imagine that he is clothed with the authority and executing the functions of a Fouché? That the House of Representatives—the grand inquest of the nation, invested by the Constitution with the power to impeach every officer of the Government, and consequently to supervise all their official acts—is to be told, by a Secretary, that the causes and information upon which he bases his official conduct are of too much public interest and of too confidential a character to be disclosed to it? And this, too, when such information may be unmitigated falsehood, and when this official action involves the oppression of a subordinate and malversation in office. The committee do not doubt the power and the right of Congress, and of the House of Representatives, to rend the veil that covers these transactions in the Executive Departments, to explore their most hidden recesses, and to drag to the light, and hold up to the nation every such case, in all its revolting deformity of untruth, tyranny, and corruption; but it preferred the position assumed by the Secretary should remain undisturbed, that its enormity might be the more striking, when examined in connection with the facts and circumstances attending the removal of Sylvester.

The copy of the letter dismissing Sylvester, as transmitted by the Secretary of War to the committee, is as follows:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, April 9, 1842.

"SIR: From and after the 10th instant your services as a clerk in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions will be dispensed with.

"Your obedient,

"JOHN C. SPENCER.

"Mr. HENRY SYLVESTER."

The committee then proceeded to take the testimony, in writing, of sundry witnesses, which accompanies this report, and the substance of which is: That on Wednesday, the 6th of April last, Mr. Spencer summoned Sylvester to appear before him, upon the charge that he had, on the Monday succeeding the confirmation, by the Senate, of the nomination of Powell to the consulship to Rio de Janeiro, in a public company expressed his belief that the gamblers had bribed the Secretary of State to procure the nomination of Powell.

Sylvester denied the truth of this charge, and added that this imputation upon Mr. Webster had been the subject of general remark and conversation in this city. Whereupon Mr. Spencer observed to Sylvester that he had nothing further at present, and if he should have thereafter Sylvester should hear from him again. On the succeeding Saturday Sylvester was informed by a messenger in the Department that the Secretary had sent to the Pension Office for him after office hours the preceding evening. He immediately went to Mr. Spencer's office and was informed that he was out. Sylvester returned in about two hours and requested the chief clerk to inform Mr. Spencer that in obedience to the message sent him he was in attendance. The chief clerk stepped into the Secretary's room, and after a few minutes returned and informed Sylvester that the Secretary did not wish to see him, and thereupon handed him the letter by which he was dismissed from his place. It is proven that on the preceding Sunday morning Powell's appointment and the slander against Mr. Webster in connection with it were the topics of conversation among several persons, of whom Sylvester was not one, and early the next morning [Monday], to use the expressive phrase of a witness, "were in the mouth of everybody."

Sylvester having learned that Hon. Daniel Webster had procured his dismissal, upon the allegation that he had made or indorsed the calumny against him in relation to the nomination of Powell, and being informed by a friend that the President had said if he would satisfy Mr. Webster he should be reinstated or otherwise provided for, wrote a letter to Hon. Mr. Bates, of the Senate, in which he denied ever having made this immputation against Mr. Webster, and averring that, on the contrary, he had several times, and whenever he had conversed upon the subject, defended the Secretary of State against it. He procured written statements from four gentlemen, showing that such had been his exculpation of Mr. Webster, in conversation with them, severaly, the day preceding and the day when he was said to have made the charge; and he procured Mr. Bates to wait on Mr. Webster and present to him as well those statements as his own letter to Mr. Bates. Mr. Webster declined to read these papers, and expressed his full belief in the truth of the information, which he said he had received, that Sylvester had made the charge against him.

The committee have examined Sylvester, and he swears that he never made, nor intended to make, any such imputation against Mr. Webster, but, on the contrary, upon the faith of information which he had obtained, he repeatedly, and whenever he spoke upon the subject, defended him against it, and all improper conduct in relation to the nomination of Powell.

William A. Williams proves that on the Sunday morning succeeding the confirmation by the Senate of Powell he and several others were expressing their surprise at the nomination, and some one having remarked that "Mr Webster knew how it was done," Sylvester denied that Mr. Webster had anything to do with the nomination.

George W. Crump, chief clerk in the Pension Office; John T. Cochran, a clerk in the War Department, and Henry M. Morfit, esq., prove, that early on the next day (Monday), being the day on which Sylvester was said to have used the language concerning Mr. Webster for which the Secretary of War had arraigned him, in separate conversations with each of them, Sylvester had expressly exonerated and defended Mr. Webster against this charge.

Upon a deliberate consideration of this branch of the testimony, your committee are altogether satisfied that Sylvester was innocent of having made or indorsed the calumny against Mr. Webster. His explicit denial and the evidence he adduced, and which established reasonably the negative, ought to have satisfied both Mr. Spencer and Mr. Webster that he was guiltless; and his dismissal by the Secretary of War, for this cause, and in the manner of it, was unjust, capricious, and oppressive treatment.

As an officer, Sylvester was experienced and capable, assiduous, and faithful; as a man, he was modest, respectful, honorable, and moral; as a political partisan, he was neither noisy, obtrusive, nor intolerant. In all these points he might well be held up as an example to his superiors in place. The testimony by which his high personal and official character is sustained is abundant and most satisfactory. It is given by General Eaton, a former Secretary of War; by General Parker, chief clerk in the War Department; by Colonel Edwards, the Commissioner of the Pension Bureau, and by Crump, Cochran, Rice, and Evans, clerks of the War Department. These men have known Sylvester long and intimately, and, at the peril of their places, in their testimony they do him justice, though some of them seemed to feel that, for this cause, they too might be victimized. They all know full well that the most perfect knowledge and attentive performance of the duties of their offices, the greatest fidelity to the Government and the country, the most respectful deportment to their superiors, and the utmost rectitude of conduct and character, when connected with any degree of independence of political sentiment, however quietly and unobstrusively maintained, give no assurance of continuance in place. Your committee know no portion of the American population which is more oppressed and enslaved in will and spirit than the subordinates in the Executive Departments; none among whom there is more mental suffering, arising from a constant dread of being visited with the petty proscription of some small tyrant, "clothed with a little brief authority," by which they and their families are to be deprived of their support. It was the duty of Mr. Spencer, and would have been his pride had he been animated by sentiments of justice and magnanimity, to have protected such a subordinate as Sylvester.

It would seem quite improbable that the avowed cause, denied and refuted as it was, upon which the two Secretaries professed to act, could have rendered the ire of Mr. Webster against Sylvester so implacable. He attributes the deep resentment of the Secretary of State to these transactions. The brother-in-law of Sylvester (the Hon. Mr. Hubbard, of New Hampshire) became the security of Mr. Webster, some few years since, to one of the banks in this city, for upward of $3,000; and during the last summer, with a view to meet a part of the debt, Mr. Hubbard drew upon Mr. Webster for a sum of money in favor of Sylvester, and requested him to collect and apply it according to instructions. Sylvester undertook this commission for his kinsman, and, by note, advised Mr. Webster that he held such a draft.

In reply, the honorable Secretary of State requested to see Sylvester upon this subject at his office. The latter attended accordingly, and yet a second and a third time, before he could obtain an interview. Mr. Webster then evinced his displeasure by discourteous and uncivil conduct, neither responding to the ordinary salutation on the part of Sylvester, nor asking him to take a seat. Some time afterward Mr. Hubbard inclosed Sylvester another draft for a small amount on Mr. Webster, and importuned him to collect it. Declining to expose himself again to such treatment as he had previously received from Mr. Webster, Sylvester indorsed it and inclosed it in a note to him with a request of payment, but never heard afterward of the draft or the money. Sylvester communicated these facts to Mr. Hubbard; and in December last he was directed by him to hand Mr. Webster's note over to Mr. Morfit, an attorney, for collection, with a proposition that if Mr. Webster would pay $1,000 the remainder might run for a specified time, otherwise suit to be brought upon it. An arrangement was at length adjusted by which Mr. Webster was to pay $1,000 on the 1st of January last at the Commercial Bank of Boston, and he accordingly drew for that amount in favor of Hubbard: but he neither had nor placed any funds in bank to meet his paper, and at maturity it was dishonored. Sylvester says that he spoke freely of these matters; and of this, he doubts not, Mr. Webster was informed.

But whatever other reasons may have operated in the removal of Sylvester, it is not to be doubted that the ordinary one of making a place for a political friend and partisan had its full force. His successor is Mr. F. H. Davidge, whose name had been before the President for an appointment since the 4th of March, 1841. John B. Jones, editor of the Madisonian, proves that Mr. Davidge had been writing for his paper, and that some of his contributions were on hand when he received this appointment and were afterward inserted; but that the President then requested him to dispense with the further services of Mr. Davidge as a writer for the Madisonian, which he did. Here is the mode by which office-seekers qualify themselves for places under this administration. They come to this city and have their names thrown before the President for an appointment; they commence writing for the Madisonian, under his surveillance, and, after having gone through the proper probation and established their fitness for office by inditing stupid panegyrics upon the President and coarse ribaldry upon the majority in Congress to be published in the court journal, are duly installed into place. Is such the purpose for which the offices of this Government were created, and such the principle upon which they are to be filled? What becomes of the message of the President, and of his proclamation through the Secretary of State against the interference of all office-holders in politics? Where is the potency of his emphatic quotation to them forbidding active partisanship, "Thus far thou comest, but no further?" Mr. Davidge entered a novice into the Pension Bureau, and merely performs a portion of the duties which had been previously done by another clerk, Evans; and the only result of his labors is to relieve Evans of an occasional press of business; yet he receives a salary of $1,400, and Evans but $1,200. It appears, also, that a son of Mr. Davidge has received a clerkship in one of the Departments.

Mr. Madison, in his speech in the House of Representatives in 1789, on the power of removal from office by the President, says: "The danger then consists merely in this—the President can displace from office a man whose merits require that he should be continued. What will be the motives which the President can feel for such abuse of his power, and the restraints to prevent it? In the first place he will be impeachable by this House, before the Senate, for such an act of malversation; for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high place." The committee concur fully in the soundness of Mr. Madison's opinion of the responsibility of the President for such an abuse of power, and they do not doubt that this principle applies to all officers of Government who are invested with the discretion of removing others. They believe that the honorable John C. Spencer has been guilty of this official malversation, in displacing Sylvester, and they would not hesitate to recommend to the House to impeach him before the Senate, but that he is in some degree excused by similar abuses, which have so often occurred in the administration of the executive department during the last thirteen years.

But the case of Sylvester is another of the numerous instances which warn us of the enormity and the danger of suffering the President and his Departments to wield this formidable power unchecked, and without the least effective responsibility. It, with hundreds of others of equal atrocity, cries aloud to Congress to interpose a remedy, as well to prevent a vast mass of individual oppression, as to uphold purity in the administration of the Government and the public liberty. The practice of treating all the offices of this great Government as "the spoils of victory," and, with the rise and fall of contending parties, the ejection of a large multitude of experienced, honest, and capable incumbents, to make room for needy mercenaries, who entered the political conflict without any principle or love of country, but impelled wholly by a hope of plunder, is the greatest and most threatening abuse that has ever invaded our system. It makes the President the great feudatory of the nation, and all offices fiefs, whose tenure is suit and service to him. It is because all those fiefs are at his sovereign will, to be confirmed or granted anew after each Presidential election, that the whole country is kept perpetually convulsed by that oft-recurring and all-absorbing event.

Suppose the successful candidate for this high office had as many real estates diffused over this Union as there are offices of Government, those estates producing annually a revenue equal to the salary of each office, and he had the power to bestow and reclaim them at pleasure, would not the possession by the President, of such vast means of operating upon the will and controlling the actions of an immense number of the people of this country, scattered everywhere over it, fill all with a dread apprehension of the overthrow of our institutions and of popular liberty? The President has all this tremendous power, in fact, and in the much more dangerous form of bestowing public offices, according to the provisions of the Constitution and laws, seemingly for the exclusive good of the people and to conduct the necessary operations of the Government. The extent to which it is liable, and, in truth, has been abused, some of the most powerful minds which the country has ever produced have delineated with a vigor and vividness that must strongly impress the most careless.

In 1826 Mr. Benton made a report to the Senate, embracing, in part, this subject, which ought to be carefully read by every American. In that paper we find this powerful passage: "The King of England is 'the fountain of honor;' the President of the United States is the source of patronage. He presides over the entire system of Federal appointments, jobs, and contracts. He has power over the 'support' of the individuals who administer the system. He makes and unmakes them. He chooses from the circle of his friends and supporters, and may dismiss them, and upon all the principles of human actions, he will dismiss them as often as they disappoint his expectations. There may be exceptions, but the truth of the general rule is proved by the exception. The intended check and control of the Senate, without new constitutional or statutory provisions, will cease to operate. Patronage will penetrate this body, subdue its capacity of resistance, chain it to the car of power, and enable the President to rule as easily and much more securely with than without the nominal check of the Senate.

"If the President himself was the officer of the people, elected by them and responsible to them, there would be less danger from this concentration of all power in his hands; but it is the business of statesmen to act upon things as they are, and not as they would wish them to be. We must look forward to the time when the public revenue will be doubled; when the civil and military officers of the Government will be quadrupled; when its influence over individuals will be multiplied to an indefinite extent; when the nomination of the President can carry any man through the Senate, and his recommendation can carry any measure through the two Houses of Congress; when the principle of public action will be open and avowed—the President wants my vote, and I want his patronage; I will vote as he wishes, and he will give me the office I wish for. What will this be but the government of one man? And what is the government of one man but a monarchy? Names are nothing. The nature of a thing is in its substance, and the name soon accommodates itself to the substance." "Those who make the President must support him. Their political fate becomes identified, and they must stand or fall together. Right or wrong, they must support him," &c. All this was prophecy then, it is now history.

In the year 1835 Mr. Calhoun took up the subject of executive patronage generally, and submitted to the Senate a measure for its reduction, accompanied by a most elaborate and able report. Upon this branch of the subject he says:

"It is only within the last four years that removals from office have been introduced as a system; and, for the first time, an opportunity has been afforded of testing the tendency of the practice, and witnessing the mighty increase which it has given to the force of executive patronage, and the entire and fearful change, in conjunction with other causes, it is effecting in our political system. Nor will it require much reflection to perceive in what manner it contributes to increase so vastly the extent of executive patronage.

"So long as offices were considered as public trusts, to be conferred on the honest, the faithful, and capable, for the common good, and not for the benefit or gain of the incumbent or his party, and so long as it was the practice of the Government to continue in office those who faithfully performed their duties, its patronage, in point of fact, was limited to the mere power of nominating to accidental vacancies or to newly created offices, and would, of course, exercise but a moderate influence either over the body of the community or over the office-holders themselves; but when this practice was reversed—when offices, instead of being considered as public trusts, to be conferred on the deserving, were regarded as the spoils of victory, to be bestowed as rewards for partisan service—it is easy to see that the certain, direct, and inevitable tendency of such a state of things is to convert the entire body of those in office into corrupt and supple instruments of power, and to raise up a host of hungry, greedy, and subservient partisans, ready for every service, however base and corrupt. Were a premium offered for the best means of extending to the utmost the power of patronage; to destroy the love of country, and to substitute a spirit of subserviency and man-worship; to encourage vice and to discourage virtue; and, in a word, to prepare for the subversion of liberty and the establishment of a despotism, no scheme more perfect could be devised; and such must be the tendency of the practice, with whatever intention adopted, or to whatever extent pursued."

The remedy proposed, both by Mr. Benton and Mr. Calhoun, to reduce this inordinate power, was to pass a law repealing the section of the act of 1820 which limited the appointment of certain officers to four years; and also requiring the President, when he removed any officer, to lay the cause of his removal, at the time of nominating his successor, before the Senate.

Mr. Webster supported this measure of Mr. Calhoun's in a speech of unsurpassed ability, in which he said:

"I concur with those who think that, looking to the present, and looking also to the future, and regarding all the probabilities of what is before us, as to the qualities which shall belong to those who may fill the Executive chair, it is important to the stability of Government and the welfare of the people, that there should be a check to the progress of official influence and patronage. The unlimited power to grant office and to take it away gives a command over the hopes and the fears of a vast multitude of men. It is generally true that he who controls another man's means of living controls his will. Where there are favors to be granted there are usually enough to solicit for them; and when favors once granted may be withdrawn at pleasure, there is ordinarily little security for personal independence of character. The power of giving office thus affects the fears of all who are in and the hopes of all who are out. Those who are out endeavor to distinguish themselves by active political friendship, by warm personal devotion, by clamorous support of men in whose hands is the power of reward: while those who are in ordinarily take care that others shall not surpass them in such qualities or such conduct as is most likely to secure favor. They resolve not to be outdone in any of the works of partisanship. The consequence of all this is obvious. A competition ensues, not of political labors, not of rough and severe toils for the public good, not of manliness, independence, and public spirit, but of complaisance, of indiscriminate support of Executive measures, of pliant subserviency, and gross adulation. All throng and rush together to the altar of man worship, and there they offer sacrifices and pour out libations till the thick fumes of their incense turn their own heads, and turn also the head of him who is the object of their idolatry.

"Sir, we can not disregard our own experience. We can not shut our eyes to what is around us and upon us. No candid man can deny that a great, a very great change has taken place within a few years, in the practice of the executive government, which produced a corresponding change in our political condition. No one can deny that office of every kind is now sought with extraordinary avidity, and that the condition, well understood to be attached to every office, high or low, is indiscriminate support of Executive measures, and implicit obedience to Executive will. For these reasons, sir, I am for arresting the further progress of Executive patronage if we can arrest it. I am for staying the further contagion of this plague."

This extract is fraught with momentous truths, and some of the gravest of them are enforced by the present political position of the intellectual giant who gave them utterance. When he illustrates them, not less by his own lamentable example than by the graphic vigor with which he has stated them, who can refuse to give heed to the solemn lesson which they teach?

Mr. Clay also gave the same measure his earnest support, and, in the course of his argument on the occasion, he said: "We can now deliberately contemplate the vast expansion of Executive power, under the present administration, free from embarrassment. And is there any real lover of civil liberty who can behold it without great and just alarm? Take the doctrines of the protest and the Secretary's report together, and, instead of having a balanced Government, with three co-ordinate departments, we have but one power in the State. According to these papers, all officers concerned in the administration of the laws are bound to obey the President. His will controls every branch of the administration. No matter that the laws may have assigned to other officers of the Government specially defined duties; no matter that the theory of the Constitution and the law supposes them bound to the discharge of those duties according to their own judgment, and under their own responsibility, and liable to impeachment for malfeasance; the will of the President, even in opposition to their own deliberate sense of their own obligations, is to prevail, and expulsion from office is to be the penalty of disobedience!"

"The basis of this overshadowing superstructure of Executive power is the power of dismission, which it is the object of one of the bills under consideration somewhat to regulate, but which, it is contended by the supporters of the Executive authority, is uncontrollable. The practical exercise of this power during this administration has reduced the salutary co-operation of the Senate as approved by the Constitution in all appointments to an idle form. What avail is it that the Senate shall have passed upon a nomination if the President at any time thereafter, even the next day, whether the Senate be in session or vacation, without any known cause, may dismiss the incumbent? Let us examine the nature of this power. It is exercised in the recesses of the Executive mansion, perhaps upon secret information. The accused officer is not present or heard, nor confronted with the witnesses against him, and the President is judge, juror, and executioner. No reasons are assigned for the dismission, and the public is left to conjecture the cause. Is not a power so exercised essentially a despotic power? It is adverse to the genius of all free government, the foundation of which is responsibility. Responsibility is the vital principle of civil liberty, as irresponsibility is the vital principle of despotism. Free government can no more exist without this principle than animal life can be sustained without the presence of the atmosphere. But is not the President absolutely irresponsible in the exercise of this power? How can he be reached? By impeachment? It is a mockery."

How is this corrupting and tremendous power to be bridled? All the great men who advocated the measure of Mr. Benton and Mr. Calhoun, whilst they maintained it would effect much good, conceded it would be a very inadequate remedy. In the opinion of your committee, a more effective one would be, for Congress to pass a law repealing the limitation to office under the law of 1820, and requiring all officers having the power to dismiss a subordinate to furnish each person removed from office with the cause, in writing; and also to report forthwith the name of the officer, and the cause of his removal, to the President; and that the President, at the ensuing session of Congress, report to each House a full list of all officers removed since the preceding session, with the causes, severally, of their removal; and, also, that the Senate assert and maintain its constitutional right to concur or to refuse to concur in the removal of every officer to whose nomination it has advised and consented. As to the first branch of this proposition, there can be no doubt of the power of Congress to establish it by law. The second section of the second article of the Constitution provides: "But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the President, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

If Congress were to pass, as it has passed, many such laws, thus vesting the appointment of inferior officers, it could prescribe a particular mode for their removal, and any other conditions that might be thought proper. The justice and sound policy of that condition is undeniable. All offices are created exclusively for the convenience and benefit of the people; and, whilst none belong to the incumbent, certainly none belong the incumbent of any other office. No removal should ever take place except when the public weal requires it; and whenever and wherever such is the state of the fact, there is a specific cause why it is so. If there be no such cause, no removal ought to be made, as, independent of its generally dangerous and corrupting tendency, it might be both unjust to the individual officer and detrimental to the public service. There might be no cause, and yet one might be falsely assumed; wherefore, the officer exercising this power ought to be required to set forth to the person dismissed the ground of the proceeding, that he, knowing its truth or its falsehood, might have an opportunity to arraign his superior for an abuse of power, both before the country and Congress. All such cases ought to be reported to Congress, that it might know how a power which it had authorized was executed, and that it might correct and punish its perversion.

Why should there be any secrecy in these matters? Secrecy is not an element of our system—its great and fundamental law is public opinion; and how can this be wisely and justly formed, when the facts which are necessary to enlighten it are concealed as "state secrets." It is only falsehood and corruption, wrong and oppression, that are sought to be wrapped in darkness; the officer who means and acts well dreads not the sunlight! There may be rare cases where secrecy in the removal of public officers would promote the public good, but the mischief and immorality inseparable from such a system will preponderate a thousand fold.

The clause repealing the section of the act of 1820 which limits the appointment of certain officers to four years, it is also believed, will be of great practical utility. All those officers at the termination of that period are, by operation of law, removed for the President, without any act on his part; and he may commit the greatest improprieties in filling the vacant places, without incurring any liability for the displacement of faithful public agents. This regulation swells considerably his power, as it makes a great many vacancies with the certainty of the returning year, and subjects the incumbents more inexorably to his will than if the exertion of the power of removal was a preliminary operation. Such repeal would, besides, add somewhat to the permanency and certainty of the tenure by which office would be held; and such tenure should at least be as certain and permanent as the fidelity and fitness of the officer.

But warped from some of its most essential and fundamental principles, as our Government has been, by the vast accession to the power of the Executive, the only mode by which it can be demonarchized is to return to that great conservative principle of the Constitution, that the President by his single action can not permanently and absolutely displace any officer. He is made the depository of the executive power, and the whole executive power of our Government—not an indigested and vague executive power—not that of France, or of England, of Russia, or of Turkey, of this age, or of any past one, but as it is defined, established, organized, and circumscribed by our own Constitution; and he can not, without usurpation, wield one particle more. Our fathers conceived and fabricated their own edifice of government; they mixed and compounded different principles, but they made the structure complete after its own order. The ideas attached to the phrases "legislative powers," "executive power," and "judicial power," as used in our Constitution, are unique, and their significance is only to be learned correctly as they are taught in that instrument.

There are certain powers of our Government that are purely legislative, others pure executive, and others purely judicial; and there are certain other powers that belong to neither of those classes; and because they are to be exercised by one of the departments, or a branch thereof, does not make them legislative, executive, or judicial. The House of Representatives may impeach officers of the Government; and, when the electors fail to elect the President, is to choose that officer, and yet neither of these acts is of a legislative character. The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is clothed with the full appointing power. The function of the Senate to approve or reject the President's nominations is not legislative; nor is it executive in our system, because, to be so, it must appertain to the President. Neither is the act of nominating to office an executive power, or, indeed, of itself, any power; it is merely a constitutent, an element of a power, to be furnished by the agency of the President, as the other constitutent is to be produced by the action of the Senate. If the President's nomination be rejected, nothing has been effected by it; both must concur and combine to constitute a power, a faculty in the business of the Government.

From these plain principles it is apparent that theoretical constructions of the provisions and powers of our Constitution, by analogies drawn from other governments, are very liable, as they have led to great errors; and, as a general rule, it is much safer to construe our Constitution of itself, and by itself, especially as it is a government, not of original and plenary, but of delegated and limited powers. Though the power of appointment in our peculiar system is given conjointly to the President and the Senate, yet their action is separate and independent, and each equally necessary to effect the result. The "advice and consent" of the Senate is as indispensable as the nomination of the President to fill an office.

The Constitution is wholly silent upon the subject of removals from office, except by impeachment; and if another and more summary mode of displacing a faithless or incompetent officer is necessary and proper to secure a due execution of the laws, the position might be very plausibly assumed, that the mode would involve an implied legislative power, and was therefore vested in Congress. This position would be strongly supported by quoting from the Constitution: "Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof." But the more general opinion seems to be, that the power of appointment implies and carries along with it the power of removal. That a power to create imports the power to destroy, may be assumed to be a general truth, both in logic and philosophy; and this principle would lead directly to the conclusion that the power of appointment and removal are blended, but for the clause in the Constitution before quoted. However, the committee will not further controvert the general judgment on this point.

It is believed that there are but few statesmen or jurists in our country but who concede that an officer can not be constitutionally removed by the President without the concurrence of the Senate, and that practice and pretty general acquiescence alone sanction the contrary doctrine. In the case of Hennen ex parte, the Supreme Court have decided that Congress had authorized the United States district courts to appoint their clerks, and, "in the absence of all constitutional provision or statutory regulation, it would seem to be a sound and necessary rule to consider the power of removal as incident of the power of appointment." The judgment of the court consequently was that the district court could at pleasure remove its clerk. Here is a recognition of the general principle by the highest judicial tribunal of the nation; and it is strictly applicable to the question now under examination, because there is no clause in the Constitution, except that which establishes and regulates the power of appointment, from whence a power of removal in any mode except by impeachment can be deduced.

In the execution of this auxiliary power of removal, it would be just as logical for the Senate to contend for an exclusive right to remove from office as that the President should; for either to do so would be equally paradoxical. The power which is implied and incidental must be congruous with the express and the principal power; and it is absurd to say that though both the President and the Senate must combine, by distinct and independent operation, to effect a certain act, yet that he, in the exercise of a faculty only inferred from what he is expressly authorized to do, may, the next hour and at all times afterward, reverse and abrogate the joint act of himself and the Senate. The political effect would be yet more preposterous. The Senate is expressly established by the Constitution as a check upon the President in the execution of the appointing power. If the power of removal be accorded to him absolutely and exclusively, it practically destroys this restraint, and the power expressly conferred upon the Senate becomes to be expunged by the implied power of the President. Whenever an officer refused to submit to his will, and to carry out his culpable objects, or, from any cause, was obnoxious to him, he would immolate him by his own stern fiat; and the utmost the Senate could do would be to force him to nominate a succession of his favorites and tools. The framers of the Constitution did not do their work after this manner.

The connection between the President and the Senate, in the appointing power, continues in all its forms, whether express or incidental. So, if the Constitution had required the approval of the House of Representatives, also, of the President's nominations to office, the power of removal would have been incidental to the President and the two Houses of Congress, and all would necessarily have to concur to dismiss an officer. The implied power is to the principal and express one what the shade is to the substance: when the latter exists in a duplicate form the former can not be single, but is stamped with and represents the perfect figure of the thing which gives it existence. We are examining what the Constitution is, not what it ought to be; and yet, with the construction which we give it, we are prepared to maintain that it is exactly what it should be.

It was during the first session of the first Congress under our Constitution that a legislative construction was given to that instrument, which vested the power of removal in the President alone. Such members of the convention as were then in Congress were equally divided on this (then new) question. Washington was the man to whom the power was to be accorded or denied. The Senate was equally divided, and its decision was rendered by the casting vote of the Vice-President; whilst the majority in the House was not large. The pure minds of those who maintained the position that this was an executive power, and belonged to the President exclusively, could not conceive the flagitious abuse that has since marked its exercise; and if, after all the impressive admonition of subsequent experience, the men who established that unfortunate heresy could be recalled from the tomb, to consider the question now for the first time, it is impossible to doubt that they would settle it differently.

The considerations then urged in support of the position that this power was appendant to the President alone, are mainly those of convenience, expediency, necessity; and the strength of the argument, embracing constitutional law, the sound sense of the case, and a safe policy, are clearly on the other side of the question. Under every administration previous to 1829, except that of Mr. Jefferson, it was a dormant power, as no other President, in eight years, exceeded twelve removals, and all were for cause which the Senate would probably have deemed sufficient, and which were therefore silently ratified by the country. Even Mr. Jefferson removed but about forty officers in his two terms, and the reason why the people did not manifest a greater repugnance to his exercise of this power was that much the larger number of the offices of Government were held by his political opponents.

In 1829, a wary and keen-sighted party thought it could descry, that this power was about to be exerted by the existing administration, for the proscription of political opinions; and then its constitutional authority was boldly and justly denied. This construction was given in a speculative form in 1789; it was never practically asserted until 1801, and only for a brief season and to a very limited extent. So soon as it was deliberately examined by the generation of men who succeeded those by whom it was originally made, upon the presumption that it was about to become an active administrative power, the weight of the highest reason and of the most erudite attainments of the whole country decided against it. That decision is still unreversed and in full force; so that this anomalous and unconstitutional power has not the sanction of general acquiescence to sustain it.

Your committee concede that where the constitutionality of a power is doubtful, and yet it is highly expedient and proper that it should exist, and it has been exerted by successive Congresses, approved and confirmed by the other departments of the Government, and ratified and sustained by the people, all this concurring must be considered as conclusive of the question. But where a power, like the one now controverted, has only been prospectively considered and recognized, and long before any case for its exercise had arisen, the weight of authority for and against it being, then, nearly an equipoise, the power itself not being necessary for a due administration of the Government, but tending irresistibly to its corruption, the destruction of its checks and balances, and the overthrow of popular liberty, your committee are far from thinking that it is entitled to the consideration due such a sanction; on the contrary, they have no hesitation in recommending its unconditional and immediate renunciation.

They will now proceed to fortify their general position of hostility to this power by the weight of some of the greatest men which our country has ever produced. Mr. Benton, in his report before quoted from, says: "It is no longer true that the President, in dealing out offices to members of Congress, will be limited, as supposed in the Federalist, to the inconsiderable number of places which may become vacant by the ordinary casualties of death and resignations: on the contrary, he may now draw, for that purpose, upon the whole entire fund of the executive patronage. Construction and legislation have effected this change.

"In the first year of the Constitution, a construction was put upon that instrument, which enabled the President to create as many vacancies as he pleased, and at any moment he thought proper. This was effected by yielding to him the kingly prerogative of dismissing officers without the formality of trial. The authors of the Federalist had not foreseen this construction; so far from it, they had asserted the contrary, and arguing logically from the premises, 'that the dismissing power was appertinent to the appointing power,' they had maintained, in No. 77 of that standard work, that, as the consent of the Senate was necessary to the appointment, so the consent of the same body would be equally necessary to his dismission from office. But this construction was overruled by the first Congress which was formed under the Constitution; the power of dismission from office was abandoned to the President alone; and, with the acquisition of this prerogative alone, the power and patronage of the Presidential office was instantly increased to an indefinite extent," &c.

Mr. Webster's speech in favor of the bill reported by Mr. Calhoun is among the most cogent and powerful emanations of his mighty mind. In a series of unanswerable arguments, he assaults and overthrows this exclusive power of the President to dismiss from office, and concludes: "On the whole, sir, with the diffidence which becomes one who is reviewing the opinions of some of the ablest and wisest men of the age, I must still express my own conviction that the decision of Congress, in 1789, which separated the power of removal from the power of appointment, was founded on an erroneous construction of the Constitution, and that it has led to great inconsistencies as well as to great abuses, in the subsequent, and especially in the more recent, history of the Government.

"I think, then, sir, that the power of appointment naturally and necessarily includes the power of removal, where no limitation is expressed, nor any tenure but that at will declared. The power of appointment being conferred on the President and Senate, I think the power of removal went along with it, and should have been regarded as a part of it and exercised by the same hands. I think, consequently, that the decision of 1789, which implied a power of removal separate from the appointing power, was erroneous.

"But I think the decision of 1789 has been established, and recognized by subsequent law, as the settled construction of the Constitution; and that it is our duty to act upon the case accordingly for the present, without admitting that Congress may not, if necessity shall require it, reverse the decision of 1789. I think the Legislature possesses the power of regulating the condition, duration, qualification, and tenure of office, in all cases, where the Constitution has made no express provision upon the subject."

Mr. Clay also controverts this noxious interpolation of the Constitution with extraordinary force of argument, and, after having made a luminous analysis of the precedent by which it was established, he denies that it is conclusive, and adds: "A precedent established against the weight of argument, by a House of Representatives greatly divided, in a Senate equally divided, under the influence of a reverential attachment to the Father of his Country, upon the condition that, if the power were applied, as we know it has been in hundreds of instances recently applied, the President himself would be justly liable to impeachment and removal from office; and which, until this administration, has never, since its adoption been thoroughly examined or considered." Mr. Clay gave Mr. Calhoun's bill his hearty support, and he prepared an amendment and gave notice of his intention to offer it, which provided, in substance, that the President should exercise the power of removal only in concurrence with the Senate; when the Senate was not in session, he might suspend an officer, but was required to communicate the fact, together with the cause, to the Senate at its next session, and unless that body concurred, the suspended officer to be ipso facto reinstated in his place.

In the opinion of the committee, this proposition of Mr. Clay comprehends the true exposition of the Constitution. The President is exclusively invested with the appointing power, to fill all vacancies happening during the recess of the Senate, the duration of the appointment being limited by the termination of its ensuing session. If the power of removal is incident to, attendant upon, and correspondent with, the power of appointment, it would follow that the President, during the recess of the Senate, would be authorized to exercise a correlative power of removal. As his appointments, made at such times, would determine and expire at the end of the ensuing session of the Senate, so his removals or suspensions from office would be operative only for the same period; and, unless the Senate also agreed to the dismissal of the officer, he would, by operation of the constitutional principle, be fully reinstated in his place. While the Senate was in session, the President could not displace any more than he could appoint an officer, but would have to state his decision to remove, together with the cause, to the Senate; and unless it advised and consented thereto, no removal would ensue.

This construction, it is believed, is in strict conformity both to the letter and the spirit of the Constitution, and would bring back the administration of the Government to its true principles. It would tend greatly to reduce the colossal power of the President, and to restore to the other departments their just constitutional weight and independence. It would not impair the necessary energy and efficiency of the executive branch, or obstruct in any considerable degree the proper responsibility to which inferior officers ought to be held. For faithlessness, incompetency, or any other cause, the President could suspend; and the reasonable presumption is, that whenever it was right that the officer should be permanently displaced, the Senate would ratify his act. Some inconvenience would no doubt be produced by this practice—a bad officer might be occasionally continued in place longer than would be compatible with the public interest—the Senate might have more business thrown upon it; but with all its inconveniencies, even if the sessions of the Senate were thereby made perpetual, it would be incomparably preferable to existing things. The one would introduce only transient and minor evils, the other is certainly bringing on the subversion of our whole system of constitutional liberty.

But there would be other beneficial consequences of the utmost importance. A great appreciation in the character of our public officers, particularly in the inferior grades, would ensue. From the degradation of physical and moral servitude they would rise to the dignity of free and independent thought, opinion, and action; they would exchange the trembling uncertainty of a ceaseless dread of the oppression of bad men for a reasonable assurance that qualifications, fidelity, and decorum in office, would enable them to maintain their places. The President and the Senate would become what the Constitution intended they should be—mutual checks—and both would then be subject to a proper responsibility at the bar of public opinion, and be required to justify every case of removal. This would be a valuable immunity to inferior officers.

When this reform should have had time to operate, and to produce its legitimate fruits, there would not be a great many cases in which it would be necessary to exercise the power of removal. The subordinate being no longer subject to the tyrant's law—the uncontrolled will of one man—he would begin to feel too much security and cherish too much self-respect to play the parasite and the pander. Rising with the consciousness that he now belonged to the country, and not to his official superior, patriotism and a sense of duty would take the place of supple hypocrisy and venal man-worship. Occupying a position to mark official malfeasance, both above and below him, each officer would be a sentinel on his associates, because he would know that he would be rewarded, and not dismissed and punished, for the revelation of their delinquencies. Officers exercising the power of appointing to inferior places, not being able to reduce their nominees to the condition of minions, would at length begin to feel the promptings of a sense of duty and a regard for their own fame, and look for moral and business qualities.

The infamous spoils system, with all its abhorrent and demoralizing concomitants, would be overthrown. The Presidential election—that moral volcano which breaks forth periodically in its terrible eruptions, and in the intervals keeps the whole country heaving and tossing in wild commotion—would be tamed of that excited and convulsive energy which menaces the overthrow of social order; for it is this power of removal, enabling the President at will to reclaim and regrant fifty thousand places, and thus to sway the hopes and the fears of at least four times that number of men, diffused over the whole confederacy, which has rendered the Presidential election not the most sober, well-considered, and well-purposed act which this great people perform, but one general and wild conflict of passion, venality, corruption, and violence.

The past assures us of what would be the future state of things if the principle that an officer is only to be removed for sufficient cause should be again established. Under Washington, Madison, Monroe, and the two Adamses it fully obtained, and there was hardly occasion to exert it once on the average during each year of the administration of these Presidents; and yet, in those better days of the Republic, the superiority of the officers of the Government over those of this day, in capability, fidelity, and virtue, is most striking. The people were then neither better, nor wiser, nor more patriotic, nor more devoted to business than now, nor were our general condition and circumstances more favorable to the preservation of public and private virtue in Government agents. It is the degenerate and demoralizing "spoils principle" which has contributed more than any other cause to defile our whole system, and is precipitating us so rapidly upon premature decay and ruin; and we must expel it if we would save our free and glorious institutions.

The present predicament of the Executive power affords no argument against the truth of the positions we have assumed. The President came fortuitously into office without a party, and not himself occupying the position of a party leader. Repudiating both the party which had elevated him to the Vice-Presidency and that which had opposed his election, he attempted the irrational and impossible task of building up for himself a third one. This was an impossibility, because the two antagonist parties constitute the entire people, their cohesion having been established by years of affiliation upon distinct and well-contested systems of measures, and because the President himself is very far from being a man who, under the most favorable circumstances, could gather together and form a party. The gigantic executive power of the Government is at at this time as near an abstraction, an ideality, notwithstanding the ill-concerted and desperate attempts to make it practically effective, as it is possible to be; but its very repose and inertion will cause it, when aroused and directed by a capable man, to act with renovated vigor. The present conjuncture is most propitious for its reduction. The relaxation of party prejudice and intolerance in a very sensible degree, a calmer and more impartial view of principles, measures, and men, and the total inability of the present incumbent to interpose any obstacle, except by the exercise of the veto, all seem to allure Congress now to attempt this great reform.

Mr. Tyler was a member of the Senate when Mr. Calhoun introduced his measure, and his name is found among the majority of that body which voted for it. His public position has been distinctly that of an advocate for the diminution of Executive power. In his address to the people of the United States, on entering upon the discharge of the duties of the Presidential office, we find the following passage: "In view of the fact, well avouched by history, that the tendency of all human institutions is to concentrate power in the hands of a single man, and that their ultimate downfall has proceeded from this cause, I deem it of the most essential importance that a complete separation should take place between the sword and the purse. No matter how or where the public moneys shall be deposited, so long as the President can exert the power of appointing and removing at his pleasure the agents selected for their custody, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy is in fact the treasurer. A permanent radical change should therefore be decreed."

The patronage incident to the Presidential office, already great, is constantly increasing. Such increase is destined to keep pace with our population, until, without a figure of speech, an army of office-holders will overspread the land. The unrestrained power exerted by a selfish, ambitious man, in order either to perpetuate his authority or to hand it over to some favorite as his successor, may lead to the employment of all the means within his control to accomplish his object. The right to remove from office, while subjected to no just restraint, is inevitably destined to produce a spirit of crawling servility with the official corps, which, in order to uphold the hands which feed them, would lead to direct and active interference in elections, both State and Federal, thereby subjecting the course of State legislation to the dictation of the chief executive officer, and making the will of that officer absolute and supreme. I will, at a proper time, invoke the action of Congress upon this subject, and shall readily acquiesce in the adoption of all proper measures which are calculated to arrest these evils, so full of danger in their tendency. I will remove no incumbent from office who has faithfully and honestly acquitted himself of the duties of his office, except in such cases where such officers have been guilty of an active partisanship, or by secret means, the less manly, and therefore the more objectionable, has given his official influence to the purposes of party, thereby bringing the patronage of the Government into conflict with the freedom of elections.

In his message to Congress at the commencement of the extra session, he again takes up the same subject and treats it thus: "The power of appointing to office is one of a character the most delicate and responsible. The appointing power is ever more exposed to be led into error. With anxious solicitude to select the most trustworthy for official station, I can not be supposed to possess a personal knowledge of the qualifications of every applicant. I deem it therefore proper, in this most public manner, to invite, on the part of the Senate, a just scrutiny into the character and pretensions of every person whom I may bring to their notice in the regular form of a nomination for office. Unless persons every way trustworthy are employed in the public service, corruption and irregularity will inevitably follow. I shall, with the greatest cheerfulness, acquiesce in the decision of that body, and, regarding it as wisely constituted to aid the Executive department in the performance of this delicate duty, I shall look to its "consent and advice" as given only in furtherance of the best interests of the country. I shall also, at the earliest proper occasion, invite the attention of Congress to such measures as, in my judgment, will be best calculated to regulate and control the Executive power, in reference to this vitally interesting subject.

In his message at the beginning of the present session, he again presents this subject, thus: "I feel it my duty to bring under your consideration a practice which has grown up in the administration of the Government, and which I am deeply convinced ought to be corrected. I allude to the exercise of power which usage, rather than reason, has vested in the President, of removing incumbents from office, in order to substitute others more in favor with the dominant party. My own conduct, in this respect, has been governed by a conscientious purpose to exercise the removing power only in cases of unfaithfulness or inability, or in those in which its exercise appeared necessary in order to discontinue and suppress that spirit of active partisanship, on the part of holders of office, which not only withdraws them from the steady and impartial discharge of their official duties, but exerts an undue and injurious influence over elections, and degrades the character of the Government, inasmuch as it exhibits the Chief Magistrate as being a party, through his agents, in the secret plots or open workings of political parties.

"In respect to the exercise of this power, nothing should be left to discretion which may safely be regulated by law; and it is of high importance to restrain, as far as possible, the stimulus of personal interests in public elections. Considering the great increase which has been made in public offices in the last quarter of a century, and the probability of further increase, we incur the hazard of witnessing violent political contests, directed too often to the single object of retaining office by those who are in, or obtaining it by those who are out. Under the influence of these convictions, I shall cordially concur in any constitutional measure for regulating, and, by regulating, restraining the power of removal." These are just and sensible views, mixed up with a profusion of fine promises, and the country may hope for something from Mr. Tyler when he proceeds to redeem these promises.

In conformity to the opinions herein set forth, your committee ask leave to report the subjoined resolutions, and a bill providing for the repeal of the limitation of four years to the appointment of certain officers, by the act of Congress of 1820; and that, whenever an officer is dismissed, he shall be furnished, by the authority dismissing him, with the cause thereof, in writing; and in every case where the dismission may be made by any other officer or officers than the President, it shall be his or their duty forthwith to report to the President the name of the officer so removed, together with the cause of the removal; and the President to report to both Houses of Congress, at its next session, all such cases, with the cause of the removal of each officer:

Resolved, That the Hon. John C. Spencer, Secretary of War, in having removed Henry H. Sylvester, late a clerk in the Pension Office, is properly chargeable with injustice and oppression toward the said Henry H. Sylvester, and of culpable abuse of his authority as Secretary of War.

Resolved, That both Houses of Congress, and especially the House of Representatives, as the grand inquest of the nation, have a constitutional right at all times to free access to the Executive Departments of the Government for the examination of all papers therein, whether regarded by the head of the Department as public or as private and confidential; and, also, to copies of all such papers, from the officer or officers having their custody, as either House may require.

Resolved, That the power of removal from office is not expressly conferred by the Constitution, but that it is incidental to and derivable from the power of appointment, and is consequently to be exercised by such officers and branches of the Government as are invested by the Constitution and laws with the power of appointment; that a power of removal belongs neither to the President nor the Senate exclusively, but to both conjointly, and as incidental to the separate agency of each in appointing to office; that as the President is clothed by the Constitution during the recess of the Senate with the full appointing power to all vacancies occurring during such recess, his appointment to continue until the end of the ensuing session of the Senate, so he may during such recess exercise the incidental and correlative power of removal, to have effect for the same time, and at the next ensuing session of the Senate it is his constitutional duty to lay before that body the names of all officers whom he may have removed during its preceding vacation, together with the cause, specifically, of the removal; and if the Senate do at that session advise and consent to such removal the said officer is thereupon absolutely and permanently displaced, otherwise he is, by the operation of the Constitution, at the end of said session, reinstated in his office, with all its rights and privileges; and where the President during the session of the Senate decides to remove an officer it is his duty under the Constitution to communicate the name of such officer to the Senate, with the specific cause for his removal; and unless that body advise and consent to the removal of such officer no removal whatever takes place, and he continues in his office as though there had been no such proceeding against him.

The undersigned, a member of the committee appointed on the case of Henry H. Sylvester, concurs in the report of the majority of said committee, so far as it is a statement of the facts and circumstances attending the removal of said Sylvester; and he also concurs in the first resolution submitted by the majority. But, although he finds much to approve in the residue of the report of the majority, and with pleasure bears his testimony to the great force and ability with which it is drawn, he dissents from it in the main, and also from the two remaining resolutions and the bill recommended by the majority to the House. And particularly does he dissent from the third and last resolution in the report of the majority; regarding it as asserting a principle which, if carried out in practice, would virtually vest the entire power of appointment to and removal from office in the Senate, and in fact the whole executive power of the Government, a result which, in his belief, the framers of the Constitution never contemplated; which is against the contemporaneous exposition given to that instrument, and which would, in effect, constitute the Senate the supervisor and dictator of the Executive, and end in that concentration of power in one branch of the Government which the faithful and vigilant patriot has ever feared and sought to avoid. The undersigned might go into an elaborate argument to sustain his views in relation to the subjects submitted by the majority, but he at present contents himself with the simple expression of his opinion, and his dissent from that part of the report, and the resolutions, and bill of the majority, to which he has above referred.

EDMUND BURKE.

The banks under this bill will receive $1,000 in circulation for every $700 of coin and bonds, and as further security for the circulation a statutory lien is created on the general assets of the bank.

I will say further that the bill covers quite a number of questions, some of which have been discussed during the session, and that I should like to have the bill laid on the table, in order that at some future day I may call it up and by the consent of the Senate address the Senate on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table awaiting the motion of the Senator from Colorado.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Mrs. Mary G. Shott be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. MORRILL, it was Ordered, That the papers with Senate bill No. 719, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of "the American Grocer" be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

SALE OF LIQUOR NEAR SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and it hereby is, instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law against the sale, furnishing, or keeping of intoxicating drinks in the near vicinity of the Soldiers' Home, in the District of Columbia, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

I should like to call the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs specially to this subject. Anybody who drives out of this town at any time, or rides or walks, will find the Soldiers' Home full of a large number of the old, broken-down soldiers of the United States, whom we are trying to make happy and comfortable there, surrounded by a cordon on every side—I believe really on every side and on every road—of dramshops, where these poor old fellows are tempted in and all their money gotten away from them, and they get too much stimulant and are frequently robbed on their way back. I should like to have the Military Committee consider (as we have in many of the States and in many cities in respect of public schools and other institutions) the propriety of seeing if we can not remove those temptations a little farther away

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,000 extra copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, showing the progress made in said survey during the year ending June 30, 1885, for distribution by said superintendent.

MICHAEL J. HEWSTON.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that the bill (S. 329) to increase the pension of Michael J. Hewston, which was reported adversely yesterday, I think, or the day before, be placed upon the Calendar. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] made the report, I think. I was not in the Chamber at the time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection the order by which the bill was indefinitely postponed will be reconsidered, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

SAINT LOUIS AND SAN FRANCISCO RAILWAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the Calendar is now in order.

Mr. DAWES. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 91, Order of Business 201. I beg to state to the Senate, after a service of eleven years, it is a very rare thing that I ask a favor of this kind. The bill is simply for the extension of time of a railroad which could not be built within the time prescribed by the original act on account of the stringency of the times. It was reported favorably by the Committee on Railroads, and at the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; and I am authorized by that committee to say that the passage of the bill will be approved by it. I ask unanimous consent that we proceed to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the consideration of Order of Business 52, the bill (S. 184) for the relief of Pearson C. Montgomery, of Memphis, Tenn., which is the first bill in order on the Calendar, the Senator from Texas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 91) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant a right of way for a railroad and telegraph line through the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations of Indians to the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railway Company, and for other purposes."

Mr. PLUMB. While this is no doubt a very proper bill, at the same time——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind the Senator from Kansas that the motion is not debatable under the rules.

Mr. PLUMB. I shall object to taking up the bill now out of order for reasons which I think I can state to the satisfaction of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 19, noes 9; no quorum voting.

Mr. MAXEY. I hope that I shall have no trouble about this matter. I have already stated that the bill was reported favorably——

Mr. INGALLS. If this question is to be debated, it is fair that both sides should be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind the Senator from Texas that the motion is not debatable. On a division no quorum has voted.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair be kind enough to state the question again? Several Senators have just come in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the regular order, which is the Calendar, the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 91) "to amend an act entitled 'An act to grant a right of way for a railroad and telegraph line through the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations of Indians to the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railway Company, and for other purposes.'"

The Secretary will call the roll.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. SAWYER. I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on all questions.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. VEST] is detained at home by illness, and will not be able to be present to-day.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Beck,	Eustis,	McPherson,	Sabin,
Blackburn,	George,	Manderson,	Sewell,
Brown,	Gibson,	Maxey,	Spooner,

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 91) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant a right of way for a railroad and telegraph line through the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations of Indians to the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railway Company, and for other purposes." It proposes to amend so much of section 5 of the act approved August 2, 1882, which requires that "within one year from the date of the acceptance of this act by said company as herein provided, the said company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior a map showing the definite location of its line of road and telegraph as designated in the first section of this act, and shall complete the said road and telegraph through the lands of said nations within the further period of one year," that the time within which the road and telegraph line is required to be completed shall be extended two years from the date of the passage of the present act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BERRY. I desire to make a motion.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Let me ask a question for information.

Mr. BERRY. I yield.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Did the act referred to in the bill just passed originally provide any grant of land through this territory?

Mr. MAXEY. No.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Nothing of that kind?

Mr. MAXEY. Nothing.

KANSAS AND ARKANSAS VALLEY RAILROAD.

Mr. BERRY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1484. I wish to say in regard to this matter that this was the first bill reported by the Committee on Railroads relative to a railroad in the Indian Territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind the Senator that on a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill at this time debate is not in order.

Mr. BERRY. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1484. I thought the Senator from Texas was allowed to speak on his motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair called the attention of the Senator from Texas in the same way. The Senator from Arkansas moves to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 191, being Senate bill 1484.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1484) to authorize the Kansas and Arkansas Valley Railway to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. DAWES February 15, 1886:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 90) "to grant to the Kansas and Arkansas Valley Railway the right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," have considered the same, and submit the following report:

In the passage by Congress on the 5th of July, 1884, of the act "to grant to the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes" and also the act "to grant a right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, and for other purposes," Congress asserted the right to make such grant without the consent of the Indians through whose territory such railways were authorized to construct their roads. The committee, therefore, without waiving individual opinion upon the right of Congress to make such grants without the consent of the Indians, have considered that question settled by Congress, and have not deemed it of any practical value to consider it here. They have considered the question whether there is any public exigency for the construction of the railroad contemplated in this bill, and what are the provisions proper for securing to the Indians through whose territory it is to be constructed such protection to their rights and compensation for their property taken as will be fair and just.

The railroad contemplated by this bill leads from Fort Smith, in the State of Arkansas, across a small portion of the reservation belonging to the Choctaws, and a considerable distance through that belonging to the Cherokees, in a northwesterly direction to the Southern line of Kansas, at or near Arkansas City, with a branch designed to make connection with existing railroads at or near Coffeyville, in the State of Kansas. The length of the road from Fort Smith to the Kansas line, at or near Arkansas City, is 245 miles; and of the branch to Coffeyville, 70 miles. The line will form a direct connection between the railroad system of Kansas and that of the Southwest and make a direct and shorter line from the headwaters of the Colorado to New Orleans and the Gulf States. These two systems of railway are now separated for want of this connecting link. With it a most important through line from the Upper Missouri to the Gulf would be completed.

The road is proposed by an association formed under the laws of the State of Arkansas by responsible men, able to build the line and directly interested in both the upper and lower connections. It seems to the committee to be not only a very important link in this great system of railways, but to be also in the hands of such responsible men as will be sure to build and run it in the manner that will most contribute to the advancement of the public interest.

The committee have endeavored to guard in the best way possible the interest of all parties in the Indian Territory likely to be affected by the construction of this railway. The bill provides, in case of failure to make amicable settlement with any occupant of lands through which the road may pass, that the amount of damage shall be determined by three disinterested referees, to be appointed, one by the President, one by the tribe to whom such occupant belongs, and one by the railroad company, with an appeal to the United States district court at Fort Smith, Ark., or at Wichita, Kans., by either party feeling aggrieved by the award of the referees.

The bill also provides for a stipulated sum of $50 per mile to be paid to the tribe of Indians for the right of way through their land, and the right of appeal to the courts at Fort Smith, Ark., and Wichita, Kans., by the tribe if they shall not be satisfied with this sum. The bill also provides for the payment of an additional sum of $15 per annum for each mile of railway during the continuance of the railway, to be paid to the tribe in conformity with treaty stipulations on the part of the United States. There are provisions also in the bill for proper police regulations and the protection of the Indians of the Territory under the non-intercourse laws.

In the opinion of the committee the rights of the Indians and the public are as well guarded as it is possible to protect them by enactment, and the bill contains a provision that Congress may at any time amend, add to, alter, or repeal the provisions of the bill itself.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill in a new draught.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to know something more about this bill. It may be all right so far as the Indians are concerned, but I want to know whether it is right so far as the people of the United States are concerned. I should like to know something about the charter which has been granted to this railroad company. I should like to know how far the road is to extend through Government land or the land of the Indians. I should like to be assured that there is to be no overcapitalization of this railroad company. I should like to be assured that it is not to be built on bonds sold to the public by various representations which turn out to be worth a great deal less than they have been represented to be. In other words, I should like to be assured that the Government is now, when it grants a right to a railroad, to inaugurate the principle that that railroad shall be built for cash or its equivalent. I think that three-quarters of the financial trouble which this country now has upon it, that three-quarters of the discontent of the laboring people of this country and the poor people of this country, arises from the way in which railroad building and construction has been managed in the past; and for myself I do not, as a member of the Senate, propose to sit and vote for any more railroad charters, rights of way, or anything of the kind until I am assured that a different style of railroad building is to be the rule in the future from what it has been in the past.

We are asked here this morning to grant a right of way through Government land or Indian land to a railroad company which is chartered by the State of Arkansas. We know nothing about that charter, nothing about the provisions of it, nothing as to how it is to be built, nothing as to who is to build it, nothing as to whether it is to parallel a line already existing and finally to be consolidated with it. We know nothing indeed of this railroad enterprise except that it has been chartered by the State of Arkansas, and that we are asked to consent that it shall go through the Indian Territory. It may be all right; but for one I can not legislate without having some more information than is contained in the report of the committee or anything that has been laid before us.

The Senator from Massachusetts has no doubt looked to the right of the Indians, but I think somebody ought to look to the rights of the people in connection with this road.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the questions which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] raises are pertinent questions and are proper to be answered, and the Committee on Indian Affairs have endeavored to answer them in the report which has been read at the desk. The Senator, of course, listened to that report, but it does not seem to have satisfied him.

I would say in reference to this bill that there are two systems of roads, one ending at Fort Smith, Ark., which is on the southeastern border of the Indian Territory, and the other on the north, stopping at the southern line of Kansas and the northern line of the Indian Territory. These two systems stop at these lines of the Indian Territory; and if this road is built a distance of two hundred and seventy-odd miles it will make a through line from all the northwestern region, reaching as far as the Upper Missouri River and from all through the State of Kansas through this line of two hundred and odd miles in the Indian Territory, to connect with the southern system of roads at Fort Smith, Ark., which lead to New Orleans and the Gulf and all through that region of country.

Upon the map it looks like a most important link of railway, and as affording an outlet in the southern direction for all the produce of that vast region of country. I think no one looking at the map or having any acquaintance with the country can doubt the importance of such a link.

The committee were satisfied also of the fact that this was a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Arkansas, with which the Senator from Arkansas, who is on the committee, is more familiar than myself, and I leave him to state the terms of the charter. It is in the hands of the men who have built both ends of the line, this long system at the north and another system at the south. There can be no association better able to build this road than the association which asks this permission to go through the Indian Territory. That they desire to build the road in good faith must be assumed in the absence of any suggestion to the contrary, and in the fact that they are very largely investors in the roads at both ends of this connection, which will be vastly increased in benefit to them as well as in benefit to the public if this road be constructed.

The conditions upon which it is proposed to take this right of way from the Indians without their consent are provided for in the bill, under the idea that Congress has committed itself and has settled the question of the right of eminent domain as it is called, the right to take property for railroad purposes from this Indian Territory, as the States have a right to take it through the States for the same purpose. The endeavor of the bill is to take care of the rights of the Indian with as much solicitude as similar rights are taken care of in the States under these circumstances. In my own State care has been taken. We have a general railroad law there; and very much after the manner of taking land for railroad purposes in my own State are the provisions inserted in this bill for settling the damages to the Indians for this right of way, with this difference: the bill enacts that they shall have $50 a mile for this right of way and an annual tax of $15 a mile as long as the road runs. That is to make it certain that they shall have what in the opinion of Congress is a fair price; and then it is provided in the bill that if the Indians are not satisfied with this $50 a mile they can go to the courts and in precisely the same manner that men go to the courts in all the States, so far as I have been made acquainted with their laws, and get, if they can, a larger sum.

Then the Indians are protected under the non-intercourse law from anybody on the 200-feet strip of land thus taken from entering there and erecting shops for the sale of liquor or anything of that kind. They preserve their police laws over this whole territory. The railroad people have only the right to use it for railroad purposes and for no other.

If it is conceded in the outset that the Government of the United States has the right to take the lands for public uses of this kind, I think that the other provisions of the bill should be satisfactory to those who are the most solicitous for the welfare of the Indians and for their rights.

Mr. PLATT. May I inquire how much of this system of railroads is in the State of Arkansas and how much in the State of Kansas?

Mr. DAWES. This particular corporation itself that is to construct this road, as I understand, begins at Fort Smith, Ark., and ends at the Kansas line. So this is a corporation for the purpose of building this road, but although a separate organization, it is in the hands and for the purposes of the two main lines at each end of this road; so that, as I understand, this particular corporation has no road in either of those States of itself, except that the corporators themselves are corporators in the other roads.

Mr. PLATT. What I want to get at is this: What system does this belong to? I hear a great deal about railroad systems in these days.

Mr. INGALLS. The Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé.

Mr. PLATT. I think that ought to be satisfactory. We hear about the Vanderbilt system, and the Wabash system, and the Gould system.

Mr. DAWES. I did not mean by "system" any set of railroads owned by any particular man or men, for I do not know who own these railroads. I only know or think I know that here is a great "system" of roads—I mean by that here are roads, substantial roads, lying along a region of country which it appears to me from the map and from a very little personal knowledge—not worth much to me—to be of great importance to the commerce of the country. That is what I meant.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to make another inquiry. This report says:

> The line will form a direct connection between the railroad system of Kansas and that of the Southwest and make a direct and shorter line from the headwaters of the Colorado to New Orleans and the Gulf States.

How much will the line be shortened over the present existing line?

Mr. DAWES. I am unable to state, but I should think it would be two or three hundred miles around that corner of the Indian Territory to reach from Coffeyville or Arkansas City on the line of Kansas to Fort Smith, Ark.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. The only road covering the section of country contemplated by the report would be by Saint Louis and from Saint Louis up, and would be a very much greater distance than that suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. The building of this connection across the corner of the Indian Territory would shorten the route from the western part of Kansas and from all the Northwest to the mouth of the Mississippi River and all the Gulf ports several hundred miles. I have not made the calculation, but it must amount to from five to seven hundred miles in all.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from Connecticut will give me his attention, the points on the Kansas line are as if here at my finger, and Fort Smith, Ark., is here [indicating]. This road proposes to go across the hypotenuse, instead of around the two sides of a right-angled triangle.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I do not understand from the Senator from Massachusetts how many lines are proposed to pass through the Indian Territory.

Mr. DAWES. This bill has reference only to a single line with a branch, striking several branches of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé road, which runs down through Kansas as my fingers run here [indicating], striking different points and running out toward the Pacific. Two of those branches of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé road it proposes to strike by going across this corner of the Indian Territory.

Mr. VAN WYCK. But how many other roads are proposed through the Indian Territory; how many such bills are pending?

Mr. DAWES. As to that there are a great many bills pending. I think there are ten or eleven bills pending. The committee have reported only two of them.

Mr. VAN WYCK. They have not acted on the others?

Mr. DAWES. The committee have not acted on any others. The committee, if I may be allowed to express the opinions of the committee, do not propose to authorize any body of men to go through that Territory under the idea of a railroad where the connections are not such as to promote permanently and to an appreciable extent the commerce of the country; but the committee assume that Congress in the action taken heretofore is committed to the assertion of the power of eminent domain over this Territory, so that it shall not lie between great lines of railway reaching from the Gulf of Mexico to the great Northwest; that where there is such a railway on both sides of this Indian Territory stopped by this Territory from a continuous line, the demands of commerce are such that it will be impossible, if it was undertaken, to prevent its going through this Territory; and it is wisdom on the part of Congress and it is prudence on the part of the Territory itself to see to it that such railroads are properly authorized and constructed.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I did not understand that from the Senator from Massachusetts there was any response to one portion of the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut. He has answered that part relating to the protection of the Indians, but I did not understand—if I heard it I fail to remember it—that there was any response to the suggestion as to the protection of the remaining portion of the people of the United States in the allowance of this right to this road against adding stock and bonds as indebtedness of the road beyond the actual cost of its construction. I did not hear whether anything was done by the committee on that branch of the subject.

Mr. DAWES. The committee have undertaken to protect the public in reference to rates, both on passengers and freights, and have made stipulations in the bill that the railroad is obliged to conform to, and have also taken care that no rights shall be vested, no property shall be so vested that Congress can not at all times modify and control the law; but as to the particular question of issuing bonds, &c., the Senator from Arkansas can give better than myself the exact condition of the corporation.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I rise to offer an amendment. I move, in section 4, at the end of line 23, to insert:

And provided further, That mortgages and stock issued by said company shall not exceed the actual cost in money of building and equipping said road.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. This railroad company was chartered under the general law of the State of Arkansas, under which all the roads constructed in the State have been built, and which has been from time to time amended as seemed to be required by the best interests of the public at large.

For my own self, I imagine that when bonds are to be sold by this company they will be put on the market like other bonds, and purchasers will be required to take care of themselves as they would in the case of the purchase of the bonds of any other railroad company.

As to what amount of money will be required for the construction of the road, I presume no company could undertake to tell in advance. The gentlemen who compose this company are the large stockholders in the Arkansas Valley Railroad, a railroad which runs entirely across my State from Fort Smith down the line of the Arkansas River, to the Mississippi, making a connection there with links to various ports on the Gulf coast. Others, stockholders connected with the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé road, which touches the northern part of the Indian Territory, are largely interested in an outlet for their system of railroads, and wish anen tire route for the commerce of that country to the mouth of the Mississippi River. These are chiefly interested in the completion of this road.

It seems to me that Congress would act unwisely in attempting to hamper them in the exercise of an ordinary business discretion in negotiating bonds and getting the money on them for the purpose of building the road. These gentlemen may or may not have money enough in their vaults to build the road without borrowing. I do not know about that, but they are reputable gentlemen, capitalists of high standing. They are in no sense speculators. They are gentlemen who have been connected with great enterprises, and against whom and against whose methods there has been, so far as I know, never a word alleged.

I know the people of my State are deeply interested in the construction of this railroad. It is not the interest of the company alone, but it is the interest of all the people that they shall have shorter and more direct commercial connection with the people of the Northwest than they are now compelled to have by going around by Saint Louis.

It seems to me that the adoption of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Nebraska would be unwise and impolitic, and so far as I am concerned I shall vote against it. This bill is properly guarded in every respect, so far as I can see, and has been carefully considered. The general law, as I stated a while ago, of the State of Arkansas is applicable to this charter as to all other charters obtained in that State, and I do not know of any particular shortcoming in the law. It corresponds with the general railroad laws of other States in every particular, so far as I know. The provisions for taking care of private property are carefully secured in this bill, and it seems to me there is no good reason why the bill should not pass as it has been reported by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Nebraska must know that the amendment would not accomplish any purpose such as he has in view. Such a provision was in the constitution, or certainly in the law, of the State of Texas, as it is in other States; but when the Texas Pacific Railway was built the contract was let to a contract company, and bonds were issued for the price of the contract. I state this merely as current history, and I have no doubt it is true. In that way the law was evaded by making a contract to build the road for more than it could be built for, but it was one of those things into which no inquiry could practically be made, because the question of cost is a very indefinite one, and it is not everybody who will contract to build a railroad. My granger friend from Nebraska would not feel himself prepared to take a contract to build four or five hundred miles of railroad in as many days; it requires very much capital.

The Senator from Connecticut has some doubt about this business. It is very true, as he says, that there have been great evils in regard to the building of railroads growing out of the fact that they have been built in unnecessary places and bonded to an extent which was entirely unreasonable. I beg leave to say, generally speaking, that the people whom he represents, and not the people of the West, have had great profit out of that class of transactions. The people of the Western country have been desirous for the building of roads, but the money must necessarily come from New England and New York. The people of the West have generally been willing to pay the price, and I can say, I think without any fear of successful contradiction, that there was no particular modesty on the part of New England people in fixing the price for which they would build these railroads, and so they have put on first-mortgage bonds and second-mortgage bonds and income bonds, and first-preferred stock and second-preferred stock and common stock, and so on, &c., in such a way that the burden on the people of the West has been remarkably heavy. I should have hoped that we at least might have been permitted to say something about that first, rather than to have the beneficiaries of that sort of transaction reproaching us with it.

Seriously, Mr. President, the addition of 150 miles of railroad to the 125,000 miles now built and in operation in the United States is not going to disturb the labor market a great deal, nor any other market. It is going to put no very great burden on any laboring man or poor man, but will give him a little more opportunity to labor and to get the money for his labor. Unless we can extend our jurisdiction pretty generally over the United States in such a way as to control the railroad building over a very large area of country, what little we can do in the Indian Territory in stopping building there would not have very much effect either on the labor market or the market for steel or other railroad supplies.

If the Senator from Connecticut is going into the labor question on this bill, I hope he will not give us a homeopathic dose, but that he will embrace within the purview of his operations for the purpose of affecting the labor question the entire railroad system of the United States, and make a drive at all the railroad building everywhere to meet the views which he has expressed on this occasion, and not keep the Indian Territory as an example of what he would like to do when it will have no effect in the direction in which he seeks to arrive at results.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I do not want to discuss this matter on the question of whether New England has done this thing or that thing, or whether the West has done this thing or that thing. I want to discuss it on broader principles. I do not want to discuss it specifically with regard to any labor movement. I want the Senate for once to understand, if it is possible, that the time has come in the history of this Government when it ought not to allow fictitious railroad building any longer, where it can control the matter. By fictitious railroad building I mean fictitious capitalization.

If people in my section have put bonds on the market and sold them and built roads after that fashion so that they have cost two or three times as much when they are represented by capital as they ought to have cost in fact, and thereby an additional burden, a triple burden, is laid on all the people of the United States, or at least all who have occasion to support the railroads, and that embraces pretty much all the people—I am not here to defend the people of my section.

I do, however, believe that this subject is a wider and a broader and a deeper subject than the Senator from Kansas seems to think it is. I have no desire to stop the building of a railroad in the Indian Territory; but now when the first opportunity occurs after I have examined this question carefully, as I have through the past summer, I am called upon to act in my place as a Senator, I am desirous that the Senate shall stop in what it has been doing heretofore.

We can not regulate this matter of railroad building in the States. If a State chooses to charter railroad companies in such a way that the proprietors can in building their road capitalize it for twice, three, or four times as much as it ought to be capitalized for, so that if any dividends are paid they are to be paid upon a capital twice, three, or four times as large as the public ought to pay dividends upon—if the States choose to do that the Congress of the United States can not interfere. If it could I would be glad to extend the action of Congress over all the future railroad building of this country. I would be glad if it were in the power of Congress by an enactment which we might pass here to have it provided that hereafter no railroad should be capitalized for more than its actual fair cost to build. I believe that no measure would so protect the people in their interest as such a measure. But we can not do it. We can not interfere with railroad building in the States. But when we are asked to grant a right to a railroad company, I think it is not only our privilege but it is our duty to understand how that railroad is to be built, whether there is a necessity for it, whether it is to be built with cash or bonds and unpaid stock, and what is to be the probable effect upon the people who have to support that railroad.

If I choose to reply to the Senator from Kansas in the way in which he replied to me, I might intimate that the people of Connecticut had had some experience with Arkansas railroads, and that they have not gotten very rich out of that experience either.

Mr. PLUMB. What railroads?

Mr. PLATT. Arkansas railroads. But I do not wish to discuss this subject in any such temper or on any such plane. I have sent to the Library and obtained the statutes of Arkansas. I have had but a moment's time to look at them, but I find this: I find that any number of persons, five or more, may associate, and as soon as stock of a thousand dollars per mile of the railroad intended to be built shall be subscribed in good faith they may organize, and then they have at some future time to make a certificate that they have paid in 5 per cent. of that subscription. I may be mistaken in the examination of these laws, but if I am not, all the cash subscription ever required of stockholders in that railroad is 5 per cent. upon $1,000 a mile, or $50 a mile. If I understand—and I have had but a moment's time to examine them—the laws of Arkansas under which this road is to be built, the only provision for the payment of any money for the building of the road is $50 a mile. What is to be the result? Bonds are to be put on the market; prospectuses are to be issued setting forth the great advantages of this railroad; capitalists are to be invoked to sell its bonds; people will take them if they have not learned too dearly by the experience of the past, as probably they have not, at a high rate. The road will be built by the contractors for the bonds (except such of them as may be sold for cash) and for the stock of the road; and what is the inevitable result? That this road, in bonds, in stock, and in watered stock, will represent when it comes to be constructed and put in operation twice or three times the amounts for which it ought to have been built.

This little road perhaps is not of much consequence; but the assent of the Government to that principle is of immense consequence. I have learned this by an examination during the past summer upon the Committee on Interstate Commerce, of which the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] is chairman. I have learned by that investigation how deeply this question interests the country. Of the entire capitalization of the railroads of this country it is estimated that more than half is fictitious. What does that mean? It means that the great railroad tax which the people of this country pay from year to year and from day to day is double what it ought to be in this country.

I am not standing here in any narrow sense to advocate the claims of labor and laboring men. I trust my reputation in the Senate is too well established for anybody to suppose that I am a demagogue.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask my honorable friend from Connecticut if, in the very interesting statement he has just made, he means to say that the investigation of the committee of which he was a member showed that the capital of the railroads, the dividend-paying capital, was more than half fictitious, so that the railroads were earning a percentage upon fictitious stock equal to their actual cost?

Mr. PLATT. The statement I made was this, and it is backed up in Poor's Manual, that taking the entire capitalization, bonds and stock, of this country it is double—I do not speak accurately, but I speak in general terms—it is double the cost or the value of these roads.

Mr. HOAR. That I understood.

Mr. PLATT. Now let me go a little further. I will answer that question.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator added that it followed from that statement that the burden of the people in supporting these railroads, paying them freights and fares, was doubled.

Mr. PLATT. It may not follow exactly; but if the Senator will take any railroad in Massachusetts and study its history, I think he will scarcely be able to find one in which there is not fictitious capitalization, by which I mean a capitalization over and above any cost of the road and over and above any fair valuation of the road. It is the rule of railroad building and railroad operation in this country.

Mr. HOAR. I do not like to interrupt the Senator too much, but I wish to say that while I entirely sympathize with his general views on this subject, and while there never has come up a railroad charter through the Territories in this or the other House for the last fifteen years to my knowledge in which I have not endeavored to insert clauses, sometimes successfully and sometimes unsuccessfully, for this security, I think the Senator does injustice to the railroad system of Massachusetts, which is very carefully guarded. There have been, especially in one conspicuous instance and in one or two less conspicuous instances, cases of watering the stock of those railroads; but as a rule the law of railroad construction in Massachusetts has been the actual paying in in cash of the capital stock of the roads, secured by very strict legislation, the absolute sinking by the original builders of a road of its entire original cost, and sometimes that has been repeated more than once in the loss of interest before there was any dividend on stock.

Mr. PLATT. I see that my time has almost expired, Mr. President. I was drawn into this discussion on the moment. I can give facts and statistics which are a great deal more valuable than any statements which I might make upon recollection. Possibly the Senator from Massachusetts is right, but I think he will find when he comes to examine the statistics that in all the roads there is what is called watered stock. I have been drawn into this discussion without preparation and without thought. I have been drawn into it in this way. Here is a proposition to grant a railroad a right of way through the Indian Territory. It is taken up ahead of a hundred other cases which are entitled to preference on the Calendar. I have had no opportunity to examine it and examine the laws of the State of Arkansas except as I could examine them here at my desk; but I assume if there was any such haste as made it necessary to take this up when a hundred other cases stood ahead of it which were entitled to preference, there was at least reason why it should be examined somewhat carefully.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHACE in the chair). It is the duty of the Chair to inform the Senator from Nebraska that the morning hour has expired. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 194), to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

SAINT LOUIS AND SAN FRANCISCO RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. VAN WYCK. If the Senator from New Hampshire will for one moment allow me, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate passed this morning the bill (S. 91) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant a right of way for a railroad and telegraph line through the lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations of Indians to the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railway Company, and for other purposes." I do it for the purpose of having both these bills put on the same platform; and if this matter should have been considered in the bill hastily passed, I desire that an opportunity shall be offered to consider it and apply the same principle to that as to this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE].

Mr. MAHONE. I wish to modify the amendment I offered yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modification will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is in section 3, line 14, to strike out all after "schools" down to and including the word "schools," in line 15, as follows:

> The number of white and the number of colored common schools

And to insert in lieu thereof:

> The number of white and colored children of the school age prescribed by this act for each county and city as given by the census of 1880, and the number of children, white and colored, of such school age attending school, the number of schools in operation in each county and city, white and colored, the school term for each class, the number of teachers employed, white and colored, male and female, and the average compensation paid such teachers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia as modified.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should like to have it reported again, as I understand it is not the same amendment which was presented yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read again.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. MAHONE.

Mr. BLAIR. I am very glad the Senator from Virginia has modified his amendment, as the modification relieves it of the only objection I had to it last night. It simply calls for matter which is available through the census and through the reports of the superintendents of education of the various States. I see no objection to the amendment as it is now proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to call attention to the provisions of section 6. That section is in these words:

> SEC. 6. That the money appropriated and apportioned under the provisions of this act to the use of any Territory shall be applied to the use of common and industrial schools therein by the Secretary of the Interior.

That makes the Secretary of the Interior the sole arbiter, the only person qualified to perform any act in regard to the distribution or use of this money, under which he may employ teachers; he may build school-houses; he may employ general agents or special agents of his Department. In other words, he may take all that money for any purpose which he considers germane to the educational interests of any Territory, and there is no power to prevent or to limit in any way the exercise of any discretion that he may see fit to use. I think that that whole section is really an anachronism; that is to say, I think the explanation of the Senator from Massachusetts yesterday showed fairly that the committee, if its attention had been called to it, would have stricken it out. It is not necessary to the purpose of the bill at all, because section 10, which is the one that was referred to yesterday, provides generally for the distribution of the money in the States and Territories; and the sixth section ought to have been stricken out, but the Senate voted otherwise. I now, therefore, move an amendment in order to take this power away from the Secretary of the Interior and put it where it belongs, by striking out all the words in line 4 and inserting "under the direction of the Legislature thereof," so that the Legislature of the Territory shall have the same power with reference to this money which is given by other portions of the bill to the Legislatures of the several States.

I think there can be no objection to this, because certainly it will not be claimed that the Secretary of the Interior ought to organize an educational bureau for the States or the Territories in his Department and carry on all the minutiæ of education in these remote communities, without any reference to the local desire, or without any reference to the local authorities.

Mr. BLAIR. This matter was debated a little yesterday, and I supposed it was settled. The vote was substantially upon the question whether the Secretary of the Interior should have control of the expenditure of this money within the Territories, and, as the Senator has said, the motion to strike out the section was decided in the negative by the Senate. I would restate for a moment the strong reasons, as it seems to me, for retaining this power in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior.

In the Territory of New Mexico and in the Territory of Utah it would be very difficult to insure the application of these funds through the local Legislature to the equal benefit of common schools. If this money should fall into the hands of a Mormon Legislature it is quite apparent that it would hardly be applied to the support of the common schools which are being built up in the Territory of Utah against Mormon influence, for the purpose, so far as they may have influence, of the counteraction of the system of polygamy. I think it is true that we shall have to rely very largely, perhaps as largely as upon any other influence or power whatever, on the common schools, the effect of education properly conducted on the rising population in the Territory of Utah, for the spread of a sentiment which will result in the extinction of that crime.

In the Territory of New Mexico also, which will receive under this act between $700,000 and $800,000 in all, there are reasons equally conclusive why the control of this money should be kept in the hands of an authority which sympathizes with the general purposes of this act, charged, of course, to carry the money to the children generally, and to insure to them, against any adverse influences, local or otherwise, the advantages of a common-school instruction.

So far as the other Territories—Wyoming, Dakota, Montana, Washington, and Idaho—are concerned, it is not a matter of any particular importance, because their Legislatures would of course appropriate this money in substantially the same way that the Secretary of the Interior, would be likely to do so at least; and yet we have retained in this section the feature of industrial education, and if anything is to be done in these rising commonwealths to plant that system of instruction within their borders, it would be better that there should be a central power here at Washington to direct the expenditure which might go in several of the Territories to industrial education.

In any view of it that may be adopted it seems to me that the previous action of the Senate is wise, and it ought not to be interfered with. The section should stand as it now is.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire how much of an industrial school he supposes he could establish in Utah with the magnificent sum of $9,942 the first year and the second year about $14,000?

Mr. BLAIR. I think that amount of money, properly expended, would do a great deal toward giving instruction in some of the industrial arts in particular schools, or possibly toward the establishment of a school, if there should be suitable co-operation on the part of the people, which the bill contemplates in all cases. That might be worth a great deal. A little money goes a great way sometimes.

But that is not the point so much as it is that whatever goes to the Territory of Utah, whatever goes to the Territory of New Mexico, should go to the common school or to the industrial school if it be thought best; and I do not think, if we pay this over to the control of the Legislature of New Mexico, it will be of very much advantage to the common non-sectarian schools, and it certainly would not be wise to trust a dollar to the expenditure of a Mormon Legislature.

Mr. TELLER. I think that the Senator from New Hampshire is not as conversant with the condition of the Territories as he is, perhaps, with that of New Hampshire and some of the other sections of the country. As I said yesterday, there is not to my knowledge—and I have a pretty thorough knowledge of the Western Territories—and there has not been in that Western country an industrial school at any time; and what is more, there is no necessity for an industrial school, unless it is for the education of Indians, and I am sorry to say I do not know of any that are being conducted in the Territories for that purpose, to any considerable extent at least, and this does not apply to that class of schools.

Mr. BLAIR. The question is whether the money shall be taken out of the control of the Secretary of the Interior and given to the Legislature.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that, but that is one of the arguments the Senator uses why it ought not to be put under the control of the Legislature of the Territory, that the Secretary of the Interior might desire to establish industrial schools in the Territories. He may desire to do so, but he will find no money under this bill to do it if he does so desire, and he will find no subjects for his school. There is not any portion of the face of the earth that needs an industrial school so little as do the free Territories of the Northwest, New Mexico included. The people there can find enough to do. They have got a virgin land, they have got wealth untold in the natural advantages of the country and the soil, and if they desire to follow trades they do not have any trouble. That is not the place where you need industrial schools; you do not want them, can not get them under the bill, and if you had millions of money you could not induce those people to patronize such schools to any considerable extent.

Now, as I understand the purpose of this bill, if it is anything at all it is to stimulate and assist the struggling communities who are anxious to do more than their financial ability will admit, and the Senator proposes in all these Territories that the Secretary of the Interior, if he sees fit, shall run one class of schools and the government of the Territory shall run another. Why, Mr. President, there are counties in these Territories that pay more money every year for the support of education than a whole Territory will get under this bill. It is a mere pittance they are getting; it amounts, as I said yesterday, practically to nothing. Neither does it in other sections that are not Territories. Take the State of Colorado. I believe the amount she will get in eight years would be $129,783. The first year it would be $11,798. It is not enough to make any perceptible difference with the educational facilities in that section of country.

If this money is to be of any value at all, the little pittance that is doled out must go into the treasury of the State or Territory, and the local authorities must control it. If you should give a million dollars a year to the Territories it might be used under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior to some advantage, though I do not believe it would. I do not believe it could be possibly used by the Secretary of the Interior with the discretion and with the judgment that it would be used by the Territorial authorities of these Territories; and it seems to me that nobody ought to object to the Territorial Legislature determining as to the disposition of this money. Let them determine it through their executive officers appointed for the purpose.

I do not know that you should make a bad rule for all the Territories simply because there is a condition of affairs in Utah that may be objectionable. I know one thing; I know that in Utah they have maintained schools for many years and that they pay a large amount of money for them. I have no doubt they teach the Mormon doctrines in their schools. I think the prevailing doctrine would be likely to be taught in any community where nine-tenths of the people worshipped in one manner. I think if nine-tenths of a community were Episcopalians or Methodists or Baptists or Quakers there would be teachers in the schools of those denominations, and there would be a Quaker education or a Baptist education, whichever denomination predominated to such a great extent. It is not unusual; it is not astonishing; and if they do take in some heresies with their education it is better they should have it with those heresies, which they would get anyhow, than not to have the education at all. The attempt, then, to have the Secretary of the Interior distribute this money as he may, in some other method than that agreeable to the people of the Territory, will be simply to throw it away.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator has spoken in so many directions and so little to the point of the amendment that I feel almost the necessity of saying a word to recall the Senate to the real issue, which is simply whether the Secretary of the Interior shall distribute these amounts in the Territories in his discretion or whether the Legislatures of the Territories shall perform that function.

The Senator says he has no doubt that if it goes to the Legislature of the Territory of Utah it will go to give instruction to Mormonism. The whole amount that will be contributed to the enlargement of the borders of that institution, according to the Senator's suggestion, if his desire is to be complied with, in the course of the next eight years would be $109,363.10. If the Secretary of the Interior distributes that money it will go to the maintenance of a system of schools under what are known as Gentile influences, which Congregational, Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Catholic religious societies are assisting in maintaining in that Territory. It will have a little tendency to break down the institution known as Mormonism, so far as it has any influence at all.

In the Territory of New Mexico, to which I have already alluded as one that will receive under the provisions of this bill between seven and eight hundred thousand dollars—$708,220.88, to be accurate—it has been a matter of complaint for many years on the part of the superintendent of education and those interested in the establishment of the common schools proper, not connected with or under the influence of any religious organization or any sectarian institution, that it was impossible to maintain the common schools by the local action. If this amendment should prevail between seven and eight hundred thousand dollars would be substantially placed at the disposal of those who maintain a certain class of religious schools, when section 2 of the bill prohibits the payment of any of this money to the maintenance of schools of a sectarian character. To give control of the fund that goes to New Mexico to anybody likely to take it save the Secretary of the Interior, would be to appropriate that amount to the maintenance, in practice at least, of sectarian schools.

I have received many letters and strong representations from that Territory from time to time, the most recent of which is a letter that

I will now read, written to me by the superintendent of schools of one of the counties of the Territory.

LAS VEGAS, N. MEX., January 13, 1886.

SIR: I have just mailed to your address a copy of my annual report as superintendent of schools for San Miguel County, New Mexico. My object in so doing is, that it may throw some light on the condition of the newly organized public schools of this country and aid in the passage of your educational bill, for which we all so heartily pray. Our school population is quite large, but thinly distributed over a large area of country, and not being a State, the lands set apart for school purposes are of no use to us at present, hence the great disadvantage under which we now labor. Again hoping your educational bill may become law during this Congress,

I am, honorable sir, your obedient servant,

W. G. KOOGLER,
Superintendent of Schools.

Hon. HENRY W. BLAIR,
United States Senator.

I hope that this section may not be changed. I care very little about the word "industrial," as I said yesterday, but the power should remain with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator who has this bill in charge, and who is the father of it, announces unequivocally that the purpose of this bill is to maintain in certain portions of the country sectarian schools. I am astonished at that, for I had supposed the bill proceeded upon an entirely different idea.

Mr. BLAIR. I have made no statement of that kind.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly the Senator did.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator misunderstood me. I said the amount provided for Utah would go to the system of common schools, to the maintenance of which various religious societies made contributions.

Mr. TELLER. The honorable Senator knows very well that the schools to which he referred are sectarian schools. They are church schools supported by the churches and not by law. He proposes now that the Secretary of the Interior shall appropriate this money in Utah for the purpose of supporting schools which he knows that at least nine-tenths of the children will not attend. He proposes also that in the Territory of New Mexico, where it happens that the great bulk of the people are Roman Catholics, other schools shall be there maintained of the same character, I suppose.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator is laboring under a mistake.

Mr. TELLER. I am not laboring under any mistake. That is the logic of the Senator's statement.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator——

Mr. TELLER. I decline to be interrupted. The Senator has had a great deal of time and he can speak again after I conclude.

That is the logic of the Senator's position, that the Territory of New Mexico is not to have charge of this fund, that it is to be taken in charge by somebody outside of the Territory, because the Territory of New Mexico, controlled by a certain class of religionists, is not capable and competent to take charge of the educational interests in that Territory.

Mr. President, I am free to admit that in the Territory of New Mexico, settled largely by people of the Latin race, people who have not such a love for learning and for liberty as the Anglo-Saxon, there has been very little done in the way of education; but I had supposed that this bill was for the purpose of inciting and stimulating the legislative department of that Territory to do better and greater things in the cause of education; but now, if I understand the Senator aright—and I am bound to suppose that he means just what he says—these schools are to be outside of that authority, there are to be two systems of schools in the Territory of New Mexico, two systems in the Territory of Utah, two systems in the Territory of Montana, in Idaho, and in other regions, if the Secretary of the Interior is not satisfied with the management and the condition of the public schools. We have the power, undoubtedly, to do that. I have no doubt we could establish separate national schools in all the Territories. Nobody doubts that. Whatever may be the power in the States, we may do it in the Territories; but is it wise to do it? Certainly not with the pittance that this bill gives.

I think these States and Territories should be put on an equal footing. If you trust the States you ought to trust the Territories. They are but embryo States, and it will not do to say that the class of people in charge and control, a religious body in either or in all the Territories, will not carry out the act in good faith. You might say the same thing of people in other sections of the country. It has been doubted whether it will be carried out in good faith in other sections. The Senator proceeds upon the theory, as I understand, and so do all the friends of the bill, that you must trust the people and must submit to them and depend upon their honesty to carry out the provisions of this law. I am in favor of applying to the Territories exactly the same rule which is applied to the States. They are but embryo States, soon to be States in fact, and most of them are as well governed and as well managed and the people as capable of good and great things as they are in the States. They are not dependencies of ours, to be treated as Great Britain treats her dependencies. They are part and parcel of our own people, with the same aspirations, the same hopes, and the same influences dictating and guiding them, and I think, if I except New Mexico, there can be no complaint made of the Territories with reference to the educational facilities that they are giving to their own people.

Mr. BLAIR. I want to say one word. The Senator from Colorado does know—I assume that he knows it because he has been Secretary of the Interior—that there are two classes of schools in Utah and New Mexico to-day, and he undoubtedly does know that if this matter is placed in the hands of the Legislatures of these two Territories all that goes to Utah will go to Mormonism, and all or probably all that goes to New Mexico will reach the parochial instead of the common schools by indirection. I undertake to say that it is no disparagement of the inhabitants of the Territories, no misrepresentation of the general wish of the population in the Territories, those two at least, that this money should be used in such a way as to promote the cause of non-sectarian common schools. If this section stands as it is, that result will be attained. If the money is put in the hands of the local Legislature, it is very certain what the result will be in a portion of the Territories.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not suppose there would be the slightest objection to this amendment, and it seems to me now that the Senator from New Hampshire has obscured his usual good judgment by his determination to keep this bill exactly as it came from the committee, in some way committing himself to its terms without due regard, I think, for its substance. I do not believe that anybody would ever have seriously proposed that the entire subject of education in a Territory should be committed to the Secretary of the Interior.

The Senator makes some point about Utah and about New Mexico. I think the point in regard to New Mexico is entirely wide of the mark. But take Utah. Should Dakota, with one-half a million people, with fully 600,000, be punished because of the delinquency of the people of Utah? How about the Territory of Washington with 150,000 people, and the Territories of Wyoming and Montana, and so on? It seems to me that the Territory of Washington ought to appeal to my friend, because in Washington they have female suffrage; and does he want to take away from the virtuous and recently enfranchised women of Washington Territory the right to control the common-school system of that great area?

Mr. President, there is no limit on the power of the Secretary of the Interior under this provision. It may be used—I do not say that it would be so, but it might be used—for very improper purposes in connection with the administration of affairs in a Territory. It might be made, in the hands of an indifferent or unscrupulous Secretary of the Interior, a very powerful political weapon. Who is to limit the exercise of his discretion? How many superintendents may he appoint for schools? How many special agents? How many books of a certain kind may he buy? There is absolutely no limit to what he can do under the provision of this section, and I appeal to the Senators on the Democratic side of this Chamber who are actively aiding the passage of this bill because its passage gives to their States great sums beyond the proportion which they pay into the national Treasury in the shape of taxes, if they want a power of this kind committed to the Secretary of the Interior, whether he be a Democrat or whether he be a Republican.

If the people of the Territory of Dakota can be trusted to vote money to be paid by the tax-payers, who elect the Legislature, for the purposes of schools as well as for all other purposes of government—if they can be trusted in fact with all or nearly all the great functions of legislation, why can they not be trusted to expend the little pittance they will get—only a few thousand dollars a year—a mere bagatelle compared with that which the Legislature levies on the people of that Territory for the same purpose? Take even Utah. So long as we commit to the people of Utah the power of local self-government, the erection and care and maintenance of schools, and the levy of taxes for all other purposes connected with that government, except payment of the Federal officials, why can we not trust them also with the expenditure of a small sum of money annually to be derived from the national Treasury for the purposes of education?

Mr. President, if there is to be an exception made, why not say that we except Utah and provide some other method of distribution in regard to that Territory? Why take these great commonwealths of Dakota and Montana and Washington and New Mexico, having population enough to be admitted to this floor and being equipped in all essential particulars as well for the performance of the functions of self-government as the people of any State in this Union, and say that they shall not have the same control over money that comes from the Federal Treasury that Louisiana and Arkansas and Alabama and Indiana have; but that in their case it shall be committed to the Secretary of the Interior, who may build school-houses and employ teachers and buy school-books and intrude his personality into every single thing that concerns the schools, notwithstanding the fact that a portion of them may be kept up by taxes levied by the people of the Territories themselves?

If anything were lacking to show that there is some undercurrent, some hidden purpose in connection with this bill, if it does not make itself apparent on the face of it it is the strenuous advocacy by the Senator from New Hampshire of this most outrageous provision. Nothing could be more insulting to the people of these Territories than this provision, nothing could be wider apart from that which is due to them, and nothing could be a more unusual and unwise deposit of power than to give to the Secretary of the Interior this authority to intrude himself into the affairs of these different commonwealths in regard to this sacred cause of education without any attempt to limit his discretion.

The time has been when if a provision of this kind appeared in a bill proposed for action here every Senator who sat on one side of the Chamber would have said that it was simply intended for a political purpose, and was done for the purpose of putting the Territories of the United States into direct relations with the party then controlling the Government. It would have been said freely that such was the purpose and that it could have been the only purpose for inserting such a provision as that in this or any other bill. I make no such charge; but I say that the fact that these words are here, and that the suggestion that the Legislatures of these Territories shall have power to control this money is resisted by the putative father of this bill, is to my mind abundant evidence that he has something concealed which, if it were known, would make the bill a little less palatable than it is now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. DOLPH. I have not been present during all the debate on this bill, but if there have been no amendments made to it, I do not see how this amendment helps it very much.

If Senators will refer to the last clause of section 4, they will find that it is provided that this money "shall be paid over to such officers as shall be authorized by the laws of the respective States and Territories to receive the same." There is an express provision as to what shall be done with this money when it is drawn from the Treasury, an express provision that it shall be paid over to the officer of the State or Territory who is charged with the disbursement of funds for the support of schools.

Then when we come to section 6, and in contradiction of the provision which I have quoted from section 4, section 6 provides that this fund "shall be applied to the use of common and industrial schools" in the Territories by the Secretary of the Interior.

Then we come to section 10, and we find a provision that the fund "shall be used only for common schools, not sectarian in character, in the school districts of the several States and Territories."

Then, passing to section 11, we find that it is provided that "no second or subsequent allotment shall be made under this act to any State or Territory unless the governor of such State or Territory shall first file with the Secretary of the Interior a statement, certified by him, giving a detailed account of the payments or disbursements made of the school fund apportioned to his State or Territory and received by the State or Territorial treasurer or officer under this act."

Taking all four of these sections together, each one contradicts the other as to the manner in which the fund shall be disbursed. Now the Senator from Kansas proposes to make a new provision contradicting all these others, proposing that this fund in the Territories shall be applied under the direction of the Legislature, so that if that should be incorporated in this bill and the bill should become a law we shall have a provision that this money shall be paid over to the officer in the Territory charged with the disbursement of school funds, the treasurer or school superintendent, and then we shall have another provision that in the Territories it shall be disbursed by the Legislature, then another provision that the governor shall make a report of the manner in which the funds have been disbursed which have been turned over by the General Government to the Territorial treasurer or superintendent of schools or other officer charged with the disbursement of school funds! So it seems to me that instead of making this bill harmonious, it is made still more contradictory by this amendment.

It seems to me that we must either leave this fund appropriated for the Territories to be disbursed by the Territorial officers elected and qualified for that purpose or it must be disbursed by the Secretary of the Interior. Both can not do it. It ought to be disbursed the same as the fund is required to be disbursed in the States. It ought to be apportioned between the various counties of the State or Territory and between the various school districts in the county in accordance with the number of children of school age in those districts and in those counties. There is no other satisfactory rule for the disbursement of this money which can be adopted which can be enforced by the Secretary of the Interior or by Congress after the bill is passed.

But I do not see any provision in the bill that is adapted for that purpose. Suppose this money is to be disbursed in the Territories by the Secretary of the Interior and to be divided between common schools and industrial schools. As I said yesterday, so far as I know industrial schools are not established and maintained under any general law providing for their maintenance and their support. How is the Secretary of the Interior to divide this fund between common schools and industrial schools? Is his decision not to be subject to review or is his apportionment not to be controlled by law? Is it to be arbitrary, according to his own discretion? May he give 99 cents on every dollar of money appropriated for a Territory to industrial schools and the balance to common schools?

I can not see how such a method can be put in force, how it is practicable to make a division of this fund under any such loose provision as that. I think the money which is appropriated should be appropriated to the States and Territories in accordance with some rule to be prescribed in the act itself; it should be apportioned between the various counties and school districts in accordance with some rule to be prescribed in the act, and not according to the discretion of any executive officer. There ought to be a suitable provision in the bill for retaining any future installments of the money proposed to be appropriated in case there is a failure to divide the money and to expend it according to the provisions of the bill.

In regard to Alaska Territory, as I said yesterday, I do not think that Alaska is a Territory within the meaning of this act. I see the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] present, the chairman of the Committee on Territories, who reported the Alaska bill of last year; and as I recollect, either in the report or in his remarks, he said, "We have not called this a Territory; we have called it a District," and the suggestion was made that it would not come within the category of the other Territories of the United States. If it is intended that the bill shall apply to Alaska, I think there ought to be a special provision for it, and in due time I shall offer an amendment for that purpose, making it applicable to Alaska. Then the proportion which Alaska receives ought to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Interior, and it ought to be disbursed for industrial schools, because those are the principal schools that are in force there, and it ought to be disbursed in the same manner as other appropriations which have been made for schools in Alaska or which shall hereafter be made for that purpose; and Alaska ought to be made an exception to the States and all the other Territories. As I said, when the opportunity comes I shall offer an amendment to that effect in regard to Alaska Territory.

So far as the pending amendment is concerned, it only seems to me to put another contradictory statement in the bill by providing that the Legislature shall determine the expenditure of this money, whereas in another portion of the bill it is provided that it shall be paid over to the Territorial officers appointed by law.

Mr. PLUMB. As I understand the position of the Senator from Oregon, I think he is entirely wide of the mark. Section 4 provides for the deposit of this money. It does not provide for its expenditure at all. Section 6 provides that the money shall be actually applied by the Secretary of the Interior. Whether he shall confide it to the officers of the Territory with whom the money may be deposited or otherwise is one of those things that he himself may probably decide; but there is nowhere any provision authorizing any officer of a Territory to expend this money except it may be directed by the Legislature of the State or Territory.

Mr. DOLPH. Would it be any more an application of the money for the Secretary of the Interior to pay it over to the Territorial treasurer than it would be an application of the money for the Secretary of the Interior to pay it over to the treasurer of a State authorized to receive it? Is what is intended in section 6 by the application of this money to the schools by the Secretary of the Interior simply that it shall be paid over to an officer of the State? I think not.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know that I understand the purpose of the Senator's question; but in section 6 the Secretary is directed to apply the money to the use of the common and industrial schools. That is an absolute provision which gives him control of the money, in the school-house, if necessary, in the detailed expenditure of it for all the purposes of schools. Is not that so?

Mr. DOLPH. That is so; but could he control that detailed expenditure of money after he had paid it over under another section to the treasurer of the Territory, after it had passed out of his power?

Mr. PLUMB. But suppose he should refuse to apply it to industrial schools. Section 10 does not provide for industrial schools at all. Suppose the Secretary of the Interior simply says then, "I will exercise that power about which there can be no controversy whatever; it is my right to apply it to industrial schools; I shall not give it to the common schools of Dakota, but I shall give it to a superintendent whom I shall employ, and a teacher whom I shall employ, and I will provide industrial-school houses, and so on, and set up agencies of my own in those Territories;" what would prevent his doing that?

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator will permit me, perhaps I have not made myself plain as I had intended to do. Section 4 provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall pay over this money. He does not control the distribution of it. He simply makes requisition on the Secretary of the Treasury, who draws his warrant on the Treasury, and receives the money, and the Secretary of the Interior pays it over to "such officers as shall be authorized by the laws of the respective States and Territories to receive the same." Then the money is out of his possession. It is beyond his control if he complies with this section.

Mr. TELLER. Who does control it? That is the question.

Mr. DOLPH. It will be controlled by the State or Territory.

Mr. TELLER. Through its Legislature, would it not? The details under the bill are to be directed by the Legislature.

Mr. DOLPH. Yes; they are either already provided or will hereafter be provided.

Mr. TELLER. Then what is the objection to having this contradictory provision stricken out of section 4 and put in words which shall express the idea the Senator from Oregon seems to be in favor of?

Mr. DOLPH. The two sections are entirely contradictory. One or the other should go entirely out of the bill. The Senate has voted down the amendment to strike out section 6. I suppose, therefore, that it has determined, if it does not reconsider that vote, that this money shall be expended under the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. If that is the purpose, the latter clause of section 4 ought to be stricken out, because, as I say, it is contradictory, flatly so, of the provision in section 6.

Mr. PLUMB. It is true the Senate voted that they would not strike out that section, but that is no reason why the section itself should not be amended so as to be in harmony with the general idea of the bill. The Senator from New Hampshire says that it is the affirmative purpose of himself, as the author and finisher of this measure, to have this money controlled by the Secretary of the Interior whenever in his judgment he thinks it can be properly applied in the Territories. That is the issue I meet. He explained at great length why it might not be proper in some cases to commit the expenditure of this money to the Legislature of a Territory. I say as against the commission of this authority to the Secretary of the Interior; that is, as between him and the Legislature of any Territory, I am in favor of the Legislature that has charge of this matter under the laws of the Territory.

Therefore I think this section should be amended in such a way that there may be the same system, the same power of control, the same discretion in regard to a matter in which those people are far more interested than the Secretary of the Interior and which is committed to the people of the several States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask to have it reported again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 6, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the words "by the Secretary of the Interior" and insert "under the direction of the Legislature thereof;" so as to read:

That the money appropriated and apportioned under the provisions of this act to the use of any Territory shall be applied to the use of common and industrial schools therein under the direction of the Legislature thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. In section 2, line 3, after the word "persons," I move to insert "including Indians."

Mr. BLAIR. Let me ask the Senator whether there is any such enumeration of Indians as it would be necessary to have?

Mr. TELLER. I do not think there would be any trouble in finding out how many Indians could read and write.

Mr. BLAIR. Suppose you say "Indians, the number of which shall be ascertained" in some way. There is no enumeration of them, is there? Is there such an enumeration in the census as would be necessary?

Mr. TELLER. When the amendment is reported I will state how it can be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 3, after the word "persons," it is moved to insert "including Indians;" so as to read:

That such money shall annually be divided among and paid out in the several States and Territories in that proportion which the whole number of persons, including Indians, in each who, being of the age of ten years and over, can not write, bears to the whole number of such persons in the United States; such computation shall be made according to the census of 1880.

Mr. TELLER. In reply to the Senator from New Hampshire, I will say that there will be no practical difficulty in determining the number of Indians who can read and write. The census very likely would not show that, but there is a fair presumption that none of them can read and write. However, the Department is in possession of such data that there would be no difficulty in selecting them through the names of those who are attending the schools. I think there would be no practical difficulty in carrying out the provision.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator understand that action in regard to the Indian population in the language he proposes in his amendment, would occasion no confusion in the general distribution based per capita or upon the illiteracy as shown by the census?

Mr. TELLER. I do not think it would occasion any trouble at all. I think that the Indians ought to be included in the provisions of the bill, and I have moved the amendment with a view of subsequently amending the bill so as to include the Indian Territory. The Senator from Oregon has indicated his intention to make the bill include Alaska. There would be no trouble in determining the number of people in Alaska who can not read or write, for it is the whole body of the Indian population there.

Mr. BLAIR. What about the number of the various tribes?

Mr. TELLER. There is a census of the tribes, and if the Department should proceed upon the theory that every Indian of ten years or upward was ignorant of the art of writing and reading it would not be far out of the way; it would be an inconsequential error.

Mr. BLAIR. If it would not occasion any difficulty or technical obstruction in administration there would be no objection to the amendment, so far as I am concerned. I should be glad to see the Indian population in the Indian Territory and elsewhere included, but I should not like to have anything incorporated in the bill that is going to interfere with the general basis of distribution, so that it could be said that the amount due to any State or to the States generally could not be definitely ascertained, and therefore the bill would be inoperative. I think the Senator should put his amendment in such a form as would obviate a difficulty of that kind, and if he will do so for one I shall be very glad to assent to it.

Mr. TELLER. I do not believe there is any practical difficulty in it at all.

Mr. BLAIR. It can easily be obviated by drawing such an amendment as I have suggested.

Mr. TELLER. I do not think it necessary, and I do not see how I could draw an amendment more comprehensive than the one I have offered.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado for information if the United States does not make provision for the education of Indians under United States authority, and is it not a fact that the Indians within the limits of the States in their tribal relations are not under the jurisdiction of the States? If those questions are to be answered, as I suppose they ought to be answered, how can the States or the Territories undertake to dispose of this money in educating the Indians?

Mr. ALLISON (in his seat). We educate them specially.

Mr. TELLER. I hear a Senator say in an undertone, "We educate them specially." I deny it.

Mr. GEORGE. How is that?

Mr. TELLER. We do not do that.

Mr. ALLISON. We pretend to do it.

Mr. TELLER. We "pretend to." That is the word to apply.

Mr. GEORGE. But is not the subject of Indian education under the control of the United States?

Mr. TELLER. It is under the control of the United States. This is not the occasion for me to go very extensively into the question of how far the Government of the United States has done its duty with reference to the Indians.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I not ask the Senator whether the United States has not failed as badly in teaching the Indians as the States have failed in teaching the white people? The theory of the bill is that the States have failed in teaching their own white people.

Mr. TELLER. So far as that is concerned there is not a State or Territory, New Mexico and Utah not excepted, but what has done its duty better by its people than the United States has done its duty, if it is a duty at all, to educate the Indian children.

Mr. GEORGE. I can not hear the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. It is not my fault. I am talking as loud as I can. I will repeat what I said for the benefit of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish you would, because I should like to hear what you are saying.

Mr. TELLER. I say it is true that the Government of the United States pretends to educate the Indian children, but there is not a State or Territory (including New Mexico and Utah, which have perhaps the poorest educational facilities of all) but what has furnished to its people better educational facilities than the Government of the United States has furnished to the class that it pretends to educate.

I understand the objection made by the Senator from Mississippi is that the State has no control over the education of Indians, and therefore the Indians ought in no wise to be included in this estimate. It is true the States do not have such a control, and yet by the provisions of the bill if the Indians choose to avail themselves of the privilege all the schools of the States must be open to the Indians. If the Indians living in the vicinity of a white school choose to go to the white school and the people of the State or Territory accept a dollar of this money then they can not shut their doors against the Indian children. And that is the place to give the Indian children an education. If you could put the Indian population of school age side by side with an equal number of white boys and white girls for a year you would accomplish much more in the way of their education than you will in many years by the system we pursue.

The great obstacle to the education of the Indian is the fact that he does not speak our language. The Indian children who come in contact with white children readily learn the English language.

I do not know that any of the States accepting this appropriation would refuse, but I think they would be compelled, if the Indians were in their neighborhood, to open their school doors to them; and when we are adopting a system here of stimulating and urging on the school system of the States and Territories I do not see why we should leave a very large class of people entirely beyond the pale of the law.

That is one of the objections I have had to the bill. As I said to the Senator from New Hampshire in the beginning, the bill ought to have contained a systematic provision for the education of the Indians. On account of the sporadic way in which we make appropriations here and there and now and then for the Indians, with a few in school to-day, a few more to-morrow, and less the next day, the money has been largely wasted and thrown away. The appropriation of a million dollars has done but very little in that way; and although there has been some progress in the last four or five years and a great number of Indians have been put in schools who were not in schools before, there has been but very little done compared with what ought to be done by the General Government with reference to the education of the Indians.

I should like to have offered to the bill a provision that I refrained from offering because the Senator who has it in charge thought it would injure the bill, and I have no disposition to injure the bill, although I am free to say that I think it is a very crude and unsatisfactory bill. I am not at all satisfied with its provisions; I am not at all satisfied with the scheme. It seems to me that the bill has been thrown together in a disjointed and inharmonious way; there is no harmony in the several provisions, and I do not believe that it will accomplish quite as much as it ought for the money that is to be expended. I regret that the Senator who has it in charge seems determined that nobody shall be heard, that he seems to think the wisdom of this body must reside in the Committee on Education and Labor, and resents the attempt to do what I think would improve the bill from time to time, as if it was an attack upon the bill itself.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not now a member of the Committee on Education and Labor, but I desire to say on behalf of that committee that the bill as now reported from them is not the bill originally framed by that committee, but it is the bill framed by them, reported to the Senate, and by the Senate amended and passed. Is not that a fact?

Mr. BLAIR. I did not understand the Senator's remark.

Mr. GEORGE. I said that the bill as it now appears, from the report of the committee, is not the bill originally framed by the committee, but it is the bill as reported by the committee and amended and passed by the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. It represents the best that the Senate could do after three weeks of hard labor in the Forty-eighth Congress. It is the best that the ablest and most enlightened and best educated gentlemen on this side of the Chamber not upon the Committee on Education and Labor could do, and the best that could be done by the Democratic side of the Chamber. I presume it is a crude bill, but notwithstanding it was the best the Senate was able to accomplish after three weeks of hard labor.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire the Senator from New Hampshire to answer if it is not the fact that the bill as now reported from the Committee on Education and Labor is in the exact shape in which the bill was passed by the Senate in the Forty-eighth Congress?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly, except as to the words in the thirteenth section, which were stricken out, and the amendment which has just been adopted. This was as well as the Senate could do. But it ought to be taken into account always that the Senator from Colorado was not a member of the Forty-eighth Congress, and it may still be an exceedingly crude bill. No such bill as this could have gone through when he was a member of Congress!

Mr. TELLER. Yes, it was my misfortune to be out of the Senate when this remarkable production was passed.

Mr. BLAIR. It was the misfortune of the Senate, not of the Senator. The Senator is too modest altogether.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado has the floor.

Mr. TELLER. It was my misfortune not to be a member of the Senate when this wonderful bill was passed.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. TELLER. I will yield in a moment. I have never been a member of the Committee on Education and Labor, but this is a question that I have given some little attention to. I spent some of the best years of my life as a public teacher. I have had considerable experience in the matter of education, common-school and otherwise. I thought I knew something about the educational systems of the different States. I had made some suggestions from time to time with reference to this subject in another department of the Government, and I thought I could properly, without hurting the feelings of the sensitive members of that committee, criticise a bill which they now disclaim having any responsibility for. They now say it is not their bill, that it is somebody else's bill, and its paternity they are prepared now to deny. I do not very much wonder that they do not want to father the bill. I said before that it was crude and unsatisfactory to the friends of the cause of public education. I do not believe that on this side of the Chamber or on the other a single member of this body can be found who will say that it is satisfactory to him in its details.

If the Senate had botched the bill, if I may use the term, in the last Congress, of which I had the misfortune not to be a member, why should not the committee, when the bill went back to them again, have put it in a proper shape? Why do we organize committees? Is it so essential that $77,000,000 must be taken out of the public Treasury, that a bill ill-prepared to accomplish the purpose for which we can alone be justified in passing it comes here because they say they can not pass any other bill? I did not suppose that a committee governed themselves by what they might be able to get the Senate to pass. I supposed that the bill was sent to the committee to be perfected and put in shape to accomplish an end, and if it does not accomplish the end (and the members of the committee are now prepared to admit that it does not fully), they ought not to have brought it here. Now I will answer the question of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PUGH. I desire to say that the bill now before the Senate is in many particulars materially different from the bill originally reported from the committee. The amendments made in the Senate were, as stated yesterday by the chairman, in pursuance of a decision in the Republican caucus. The amendments made in the Senate were made against the vote of members of the committee on this side of the Chamber, but the bill as it passed the Senate with those amendments was not so variant from the structure of the original bill in principle and in substance but that I felt bound to accept it and to vote for it, as I did. However, there was a very great difference between the bill reported by the committee and the bill which passed the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I thought the Senator from Alabama wanted to ask a question. I do not object to the interruption, however.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. If it does not interrupt the Senator from Colorado, I should like to ask him a question in regard to his proposed amendment, prefacing that with a statement. As a member of the Committee on Education and Labor which has prepared this bill, for one I do not object to the Senator from Colorado or any other Senator offering all the amendments and suggestions which may occur to him for the benefit of the bill. There is no pride on my part that the bill shall not be changed. The bill met with my general approval as it came from the committee, and it has not been so materially altered by amendments in the Senate but that it still meets with my approval. I think the Senator from Colorado is mistaken when he says that the bill in its present form, or in the form which it is likely to come to, does not meet with the general approval of the educational people of the whole country. So far as I have been able to learn I think it does meet with their approval. It is possible that there may be inaccuracies in it, and that in some of its details it may not be as perfect as it should be. Nevertheless, I believe it will go very far toward producing the results which have been sought for by this appropriation of $77,000,000.

As to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado, I fail to see wherein he expects to improve the bill by the adoption of the amendment. Perhaps I do not understand fully his purpose in offering the amendment, but if it be to bring about a condition of affairs under the bill by which a larger percentage of the money shall go to the various Territories, then I think his amendment instead of securing that object will defeat it and will send less money to the Territories than would go there if the bill were left in its present shape. May I ask the Senator if that was his object?

Mr. TELLER. That was not my object, Mr. President. I will say now——

Mr. MILLER, of New York. If the Senator will tell us what the object of his amendment is I then may be able to reply to him. I have misconceived the object.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know that it is absolutely necessary that the Senator should reply to my statement.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. As a member of the Senate and as a member of the committee that presented the bill I suppose I have a perfect right to defend the bill; and I have also, I presume, a perfect right to ask the Senator the object of his amendment or what his reasons are for offering it.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly. Now, when we get down to the fact, it is exactly as I stated it to be. The bill now before the Senate is substantially the bill reported by the committee. Whether it is right or whether it is wrong, the committee sent it here and said, "This is the bill we want you to pass." This is the bill that they have so sturdily resisted any attempt to amend, upon the theory that the bill was as perfect as it could be made, I suppose.

The Senator from New York wishes to know whether I want to help the Territories, whether I want to get more money for the Territories. I am free to say that I have not any interest in the Territories whatever with reference to this bill; and so far as the State that I represent in part on this floor is concerned you may strike it out of the bill, if you choose, and I shall not change my vote on the bill nor my opinion of the bill. Colorado is not asking any assistance from the General Government for her schools. If we vote this money, we vote it because there is in this country a class of people who are uneducated and the States declare that they are unable to educate them. Whether we believe that is a fair statement or whether we do not, the fact remains that States fail to educate their children, and because they do not provide school facilities for all their children we have proposed for the last four or five years in some way to grant national aid temporarily for the purpose of inciting and encouraging the States. It was proposed, when I was a member of this body before, that it should be done by donating the proceeds of the public lands and that certain moneys arising from other sources should be given for this purpose. For that I voted, and that I supported not only with my vote but with my voice.

I want to vote for a bill that will accomplish the purpose, for two reasons. The first is that I hold it is not proper to vote out a great amount of money in a case where it is doubtful whether the object will be accomplished. I want the money which is voted for the support of common schools in this country to support the common schools; and I think we have a right to insist that a bill brought here shall be so perfect that at least there is a fair presumption that the good sought by the appropriation will be obtained.

Now I shall answer a little further. I proposed this amendment, as I said, to be followed, if agreed to, by others. We have a Territory called the Indian Territory. We have thousands of Indian children there who are not having an opportunity presented to them for an education by the Indians, who probably, in some of the tribes, are abundantly able to educate their children. We are not having it done by the Government. I know of but one single tribe that has made suitable and proper preparation for the education of its children, and certainly nobody will pretend that the Government of the United States has done anything of that kind in this country.

I believe that this bill ought to go back to the Committee on Education and Labor, and that the committee ought to go to work and put these disjointed sections in harmony one with another. Here we find that the Secretary of the Interior is in one instance to distribute the money and in another the State is to distribute it. We find that this is for the support of non-sectarian schools, and then the chairman rises and tells us that it is the purpose and object of a provision of the bill to use it for sectarian schools in at least two of the great Territories of the country. I do not propose myself to vote a dollar for any sectarian school, although it may be a school of the faith in which I was brought up and educated. I propose to vote any amount of money that may be fairly and honestly expended, as far as the wealth and condition of the country will justify it, in supporting a public common school where all the children will have the same opportunity of getting an education in the rudimentary branches.

If this amendment is accepted I propose to follow it by others. I do not know that it is very material to the subsequent amendments whether this amendment is adopted or not. You may leave out the Indian Territory with its large number of people, and you may assert that they are better able to educate their children than the people of Louisiana, or Mississippi, or Arkansas, or Colorado, if you choose. I do not believe it; and I do not see why the Committee on Education and Labor did not include all classes and all kinds of people who live in this country.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to join hands with the Senator from Colorado in perfecting this very imperfect and disjointed bill, as he calls it; but it seems to me, if this amendment is adopted, it will be still more disjointed and imperfect than it now is.

The bill did not undertake to deal with the difficult question of the education of Indian children. That has been provided for, and is being provided for, from year to year by special laws, and special schools have been established for them. It has not been left for the Territorial governments, or any of the State governments even, to do that work. It has been provided for by liberal appropriations in the past; and while much of the work may not have been successful, yet I believe there is a great advance for good in the education of the Indians of our common country. Therefore it was left out.

If the object of the Senator from Colorado in adding the words "and Indians" was thereby to bring a larger proportion of the amount of money to the Territories and then to impose upon them the duty of educating the Indian children found within their borders—if it would produce that result and it should be thought wise that the education of Indian children should be committed to the Territorial authorities in each Territory and that the Federal Government should give up any direct control or action upon that matter, I might be disposed to go with him; but if this amendment is adopted it will result in giving a less amount of money to each Territory in which the Indians are found than will go to it under the bill as it now stands. Certainly I suppose that the Senator from Colorado does not desire to produce any such result as that.

This apportionment is to be made under the census of 1880, and the money is to be apportioned in the proportion which the whole number of persons in any State or Territory over ten years old who can not write bears to those over the age of ten who can not write in the whole country. While the census of 1880 may show in a general way the number of Indians in any particular State or Territory, it does not show, I think, nor does it attempt to show at all, how many of them can not read or write. Therefore, if an apportionment comes, for instance, to the Territory of Utah and the Indians are added, and they are 250,000, the number of people in that Territory who can not write are a fixed number under the census of 1880, and that number will not be at all increased by the number of Indians being added to the whole number of persons. Therefore the amount of money coming to Utah under the bill, if the amendment is added, would be decreased materially instead of being increased, unless you provide in the bill that the whole number of Indians shall be held to be illiterate or that they shall all be held to be unable to write.

If such an amendment as that were added to it, then of course it would increase the amount of money which would go to the Territory of Utah, which I have taken as an illustration; but if left as it is now proposed, it certainly would result in decreasing the amount of money which would come to any particular Territory or State in which the Indians are enumerated. So I think it is much better to leave the section upon that question as it now stands.

Mr. DAWES. I agree with the Senator from New York in this matter. I am not quite certain that his premises are correct when he states that the Indians who can not write are not enumerated in the census tables. If he is correct in that, then certainly if the amendment is adopted the Territories will get less money. I am not certain about that; but if they are included and the money is apportioned upon them, then there will be some obligation upon the Territory or State to interfere and take the management of the Indian schools upon themselves. The Government of the United States will be carrying on schools, and the general superintendent of Indian schools will have one set of schools or one policy in teaching the Indians, while the State or Territory will have its own policy and its own method; and when compulsory education, if that bill should pass, shall apply to the Indians in a Territory or a State and not be the policy of the State itself, or if the school age adopted by the United States as applicable to the Indians shall differ from that adopted under the State laws, there is confusion, conflict, friction.

I think that inasmuch as the United States takes upon itself the work of educating the Indians in another system, it is not quite well for us also to undertake to get the United States into this system with these appropriations. The United States will excuse itself from appropriations for the Indian under the Indian schools of which they have control themselves just to the extent that they contribute here, or the attempt will be made, and those not earnest and sincere and liberal in the appropriations for Indian schools will find an excuse and shelter themselves under the claim that under this bill we are providing for Indian children, when in point of fact nothing substantial will come of it to the Indian.

Mr. MORGAN. May I ask the Senator a question about this bill? The bill provides that money shall be apportioned and shall be also applied without distinction of color. Does he understand that the Indians would be entitled to be considered in the application of this fund in the States? Take Kansas and North Carolina, where there are still a good many Indians.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose the Senator alludes to Indians who are members of tribes and under the supervision of an agent on a reservation. I should not think so. I should think it would be a very bad feature of this bill if it attempted to aid education in the State to the extent of interfering with the policy now adopted by the Government toward the Indians.

Mr. MORGAN. Then as color is the only question, and there shall be no distinction made on account of color, and illiteracy is the basis on which we make the appropriation, and also the school age is the basis on which we make the dispensation of the money, would not the State of North Carolina, for instance, be entitled to draw for the Indians within her borders, although she might not apply a dollar of the fund to their education?

Mr. DAWES. I do not know as to that. I am looking at the policy of undertaking in this way to eke out by interference and by friction and by diversion the system of educating the Indian. The Indian is unlike the colored youth and the white youth, and his education must be altogether from a different standpoint.

Mr. MORGAN. I thought the Indian was a colored man; I thought he was very much like a colored man. That is my idea about it.

Mr. DAWES. "Colored man" is in some sense a technical term. It has its meaning in laws and in our legislation. It never occurred to me until the Senator undertook by an amendment to make it applicable to the Indian that anybody would have thought that term included Indians on the reservations, who are treated to that extent as outside of the territorial limits of the State in which the reservation is situated for all purposes, and you must have special legislation to make the crimes act applicable to them.

Mr. BLAIR. There is no census whatever of Indians which throws any light upon their condition of illiteracy. They are taken by numbers and by sex. There are no data which could assist in the distribution of money for them under the provisions of the bill. The bill does not provide that every person of color in the States and Territories shall have any benefit under the act. The bill provides that the money shall be paid out in the States and Territories upon the basis of illiteracy as shown by the census of 1880, and that census shows illiteracy without any reference whatever to the Indians. The illiteracy shown is the basis of this distribution, so that the question does not arise at all as to the Indians within the States, and they are not in any way included.

The whole Indian question is entirely outside of this bill. No State is entitled to have counted in its number of illiterates the Indians that may exist in that State, because the bill provides that it is the illiteracy as shown by the census, which is simply that of the white man and of the black man and of the intermediate shade, those being the only classes of population, as I understand, that enter into the census.

If the Indian was taken into account in the census of the several States as a colored man, and his illiteracy was taken account of, then there is no difficulty whatever—he is already included; but I do not understand that to be so, for here are the tables of the Indian census, and they relate only, as I said before, to population and sex.

Mr. TELLER. If this amendment should be adopted I stated that I intended to follow it with others. I think the bill would need a further amendment in order to make it practicable to carry it out. I should provide some method perhaps by which there would be no trouble in determining what Indians could read or write.

Now I wish to say a word in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES]. My proposition did not go at all to interfering with the Government of the United States in its lame and weak efforts at the education of Indians. I no not believe that the States would be willing to assume that responsibility, and I doubt very much whether the States and Territories would do it any more efficiently than the Government of the United States, although they could not well do it much worse. It was not for the purpose of interfering with the Government schools. The Senator can rest assured that neither the States nor Territories will rush to educate the Indians; they will let the Government do it, if it wants to do it. But I said that if a State did accept this appropriation, then their doors must necessarily be opened if the Indian saw fit to avail himself of common-school education in that State.

I understand that in the State of New York the common-school system applies to Indians just as well as to white people; that they have all the benefits of it; that they are enumerated. As I recollect after having been away from there a good many years (but that was the fact years ago as I recollect), the Indians have the opportunity of attending school, and they are enumerated in the list to determine the amount of money to be apportioned to a district, and in regard to everything, the same as white people, and the schools are open to them. I do not know that the Government is doing anything specially with reference to that class of Indians now.

As I said before, I want to amend the bill if I can so that it may be applied to the Indian Territory. If this amendment is adopted and another one, the bill will still require probably another amendment before that can be done.

Mr. DAWES. There is no doubt that if there are Indians in any State or Territory who have separated from tribal organizations and are leading the habits of civilized life their children could go into schools where colored or white children go. There are such Indians in Massachusetts. They have been there for two hundred years. They do not belong to any existing tribal organization now. They attend the schools wherever they are established in the neighborhood.

Mr. GEORGE. They are taxed, too.

Mr. DAWES. They are citizens of the United States and of Massachusetts, and they are treated in all respects as such. They are measured solely by their capacity, their moral capacity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to add one other amendment to the bill, and I think perhaps the Committee on Education and Labor will not object to this one. In section 14 it is provided:

> That the Secretary of the Interior shall be charged with the practical administration of this act in the Territories, through the Commissioner of Education, who shall report annually to Congress its practical operation, &c.

It is a little doubtful whether it is meant that the Commissioner of Education or the Secretary of the Interior shall report. In proper administration the report should come from the Secretary and not from the Commissioner.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will read the whole section he will see that there is no doubt.

Beginning in line 6, the section reads:

> Which report shall be transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior, accompanying the report of his Department.

Showing that it is the Commissioner of Education who is expected to make this report, through the Secretary of the Interior, who transmits it to Congress with the other papers accompanying his own report.

Mr. TELLER. I will ask the Senator if it is proposed that the Commissioner of Education shall also report to Congress? The ordinary method is that the head of the Department makes the report to Congress and the subordinates report to him.

Mr. BLAIR. I am exceedingly obliged to the Senator for the information. It is well that those who have not had the opportunity to be trained in all the schools of Government office should occasionally receive instruction upon doubtful and abstruse questions of practice like that. The entire fourteenth section reads as follows:

> That the Secretary of the Interior shall be charged with the practical administration of this act in the Territories, through the Commissioner of Education, who shall report annually to Congress its practical operation, and briefly the condition of common and industrial education as affected thereby throughout the country, which report shall be transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior, accompanying the report of his Department. And the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

If there are any amendments that ought to be made in that section I have no objection to them, but I will take this occasion to say to the Senator——

Mr. TELLER. I shall not take the time of the Senate in replying to the courteous and Senator-like remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire, but will proceed to offer my amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator was interrupting me, I will say.

Mr. TELLER. I decline to yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado has the floor.

Mr. TELLER. I decline to yield to a Senator who attempts to belittle everything that anybody tries to do in reference to the bill, upon the theory that nobody knows anything about the bill but the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BLAIR. I call the Senator to order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire will reduce his point of order to writing.

Mr. BLAIR. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. TELLER. I do not desire to have any controversy with the Senator from New Hampshire. I propose to amend the bill so that it shall be in proper form if I can. The bill provides now that the Commissioner of Education shall report to Congress, and then it also provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall be his messenger to bring the report to Congress. In line 4 of section 14, after the word "report," I propose to strike out the words "annually to Congress." It will then read:

> Through the Commissioner of Education, who shall report its practical operation, and briefly the condition of common and industrial education as affected thereby, &c.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator state his amendment again? I presume there is no objection to it, but I should be glad to have him state it. I wish to understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported by the Secretary.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 14, line 4, after the word "report," it is proposed to strike out the words "annually to Congress," so as to read:

> That the Secretary of the Interior shall be charged with the practical administration of this act in the Territories, through the Commissioner of Education, who shall report its practical operation, &c.

Mr. BLAIR. There is no objection to that; at least none on my part.

Mr. ALLISON. Is an amendment to the pending amendment in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. DOLPH. I object to it.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to the amendment, but I desire to move to strike out section 14 down to and including the word "and," after "Department," in line 8. We have already provided that these funds distributed in the Territories shall be practically applied as they are in the several States, and therefore this whole provision should go out.

Mr. BLAIR. That is the logical result of the action of the Senate upon section 6. There is no objection to the amendment. Of course it improves the bill, and it should be agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I am glad that the Senator from New Hampshire agrees with me on that point.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator is not aware of the amiable nature of the Senator from New Hampshire. When he is met with anything of a like spirit, he is the most docile creature in the world.

Mr. ALLISON. So I have observed. I ask that that amendment may be agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all of section 14 down to and including the word "and," in line 8, so that the section, if amended, would read:

> The power to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Is there not any provision for a report to Congress now left? I should like to know before that amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. The section applies to what he shall do with reference to the Territories, the Senator will observe. It does not affect the general duty of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HOAR. I rose at the moment the Chair was announcing that the amendment was adopted. I suppose the Chair will consider it as still pending if there be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognized the Senator from Massachusetts after the amendment had been agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I rose at the time it was announced, intending to speak to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question may be considered as still open and the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is pending.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to inquire whether it is the purpose of the Senator from Iowa to propose and the Senator from New Hampshire to consent to an amendment which strikes out the provision that the Secretary of the Interior shall make a report as to the effect of this bill on common-school education throughout the country—whether that report is now to be dispensed with? It does not relate to the Territories alone; it relates to the whole operation of the bill. It seems to me there should be somewhere—there is probably elsewhere in the bill—a provision for an annual report to Congress of the whole matter of the operation of this measure.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will see that section 14 is intended to apply to the Territories, and then it adds a little suggestion that the Commissioner of Education shall make a report briefly, as the bill might affect the condition of education throughout the country. I think an ordinary Commissioner of Education will be able to state that in his report without special authority from Congress.

Mr. HOAR. Is that covered by the general law in regard to the Commissioner of Education?

Mr. ALLISON. What I desire is to place this provision on the same footing as all other provisions of the bill, whatever they may be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer an amendment, and desire to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new section:

SEC. —. That the money that shall be appropriated in pursuance of this act for the purposes of education in the Territories shall be apportioned according to a census that shall be taken in each of the organized Territories at the expense of the United States and under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior on or before the 1st day of June, 1886.

Mr. MORGAN. Yesterday, when the Senator from Indiana who is the chairman of the Committee on Territories was absent, I called the attention of the Senate to the condition of the bill and to its effects upon the new Territories. I will just repeat the remarks which I made yesterday, which are pretty concise:

Now I find by going back to 1880, according to the table presented in the report of the committee or by the Senator from New Hampshire, that Dakota is credited in this bill with only 135,177 people, in all of whom there are 4,631 that can not write. If we are proposing to do justice between the different States and Territories, why do we go back to 1880, when these Territories had very sparse population, and take from them the advantage of the increase in their population from that time? The amount of money that would go to the Territory of Dakota during all this time would be $59,737 during the whole eight years. Alabama has only about three times the population that is alleged here for Dakota, about 1,250,000 people. Alabama gets under this bill for the whole time $5,370,848.45.

A bill was brought in the other day to admit Washington Territory into the Union. Washington had 75,116 people in 1880. It is now claimed that there are 150,000 people in Washington Territory. The illiterates in that Territory, as shown in this table, are 3,850. The amount of money coming during the eight years to Washington Territory, claiming now to be entitled to Statehood, is $48,186.66; and that, too, when Washington Territory and Dakota are now paying more money into the Treasury of the United States for public lands, perhaps, or at all events a greater number of population is going there to take the benefit of our homestead system, than in any of the old land States of the Union.

Now I take Montana Territory. It is credited in this report with 39,159 people and its illiteracy is 1,077, and what it would get under the bill is $31,151.46 for the whole time, for the entire eight years, not quite $4,000 a year.

That is a very great injustice to those people. I am not their champion on the floor by any means, but I have not any doubt at all that the Senator from Indiana will be ready to claim for that body of organized Territories what is just in comparison with the people of the other parts of the United States. Commencing in 1880, we are six years advanced beyond that period, and during that time Dakota has added to her population, so that she now has—I can not recall the precise figures——

Mr. HARRISON. Five hundred thousand, in round numbers.

Mr. MORGAN. Dakota has, in round numbers, a population of 500,000. That is a tremendous increase. In eight years more she will probably have a million people, having a population as large as Alabama, and though her illiteracy would not be as great as that of Alabama, because of her not having any negroes there, and especially because she has not got any there over twenty-one years of age who can not get the benefits of this system, Dakota would go on under this basis, according to the census of 1880, and would run until 1894, four years beyond the next decennial census, as the bill is framed, and during all the life of the bill, unless it is afterward altered or amended in some way, Dakota would be drawing money on the basis of her population in 1880.

Now, I claim that that is an injustice which this bill ought not to inflict.

I am aware, Mr. President, yes, too sadly aware, that the money which would thus come from the people of Dakota goes to the people of the recent slave-holding States. I know that I yield for my State a very decided advantage in the proposition which I present here to-day; but, sir, if I am compelled to legislate on a subject like this, I am not here for the purpose of legislating for one State or one section of the country by way of discrimination against another. I can not content myself with legislation of that sort, whatever other gentlemen may do. Before I could support any feature of this bill, or have the slightest degree of respect for it, I must understand that there is some principle of justice in the bill, and that it is not a mere grab for one section of the country against another.

The committee have not considered this question; they could not have considered it; neither did the Senate when the bill was before us two years ago consider this question. It is an open question, and the Senate ought to do justice to those people.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator from Alabama is clearly right in saying that the bill as it stands perpetrates a gross injustice upon the people of the Territories, and not only upon the people of the Territories, but upon the people of some of the new Western States that are increasing in population with enormous rapidity. I had myself noted upon a copy of the bill which I have before me an amendment which I shall offer presently, though it was not intended to supersede the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, providing that the census of 1880, which is declared by the bill to be the basis upon which the whole apportionment for the eight years is to take place, shall yield to the returns of the census of 1890 when they come in.

It will be noticed that the bill can hardly go into effect for a year. If it should pass the other House at this session of Congress, and the appropriation called for for the first year should be made in one of our next annual appropriation bills, it would not take effect or become available till the 1st of July.

Then there is another provision in the first section of the bill that "no money shall be paid to a State, or any officer thereof, until the Legislature of the State shall, by bill or resolution, accept the provisions of this act." It may very well be, it probably will be, that some of the State Legislatures will not assemble next winter; and there, if I may digress a moment, I want to suggest what seems to me to be an uncertainty in the bill.

Suppose it should be true that the Legislature of some State either does not meet in regular session or the governor does not convene it in extra session, so that it does not pass a resolution or bill accepting the provisions of this act next winter, the first year of this appropriation rolls around and whatever is not expended I suppose would go back into the Treasury of the United States as an unexpended appropriation, and in that case the State that did not act within the first year would lose the benefit of the appropriation. It would necessarily do so unless the Legislature was called together by the governor to take action upon the matter at an early day.

Mr. HOAR. Unless Congress remedied it.

Mr. HARRISON. Unless that should be remedied; but now, before the passage of the bill, is the time to remedy it, if there is anything in the suggestion which I make.

But the point I was proceeding to make is this: This bill can not take effect for a year, because it is not likely that the Legislatures that assemble next winter, as the Legislature of Indiana does in January, would be called together in special session to act upon this measure. Therefore the apportionment would not begin until a year from this time. That would make it 1887, so that only three years would remain until we entered upon the work of taking the census of 1890, and five years of the time covered by the bill would be after 1890. Yet, according to the terms of the bill, we are proceeding upon the basis of the census of 1880.

It seems to me that as soon as the returns are received at the Department of the Interior in such shape as to be made a basis of distribution we should abandon the census of 1880 and take up the returns of illiteracy for 1890. In that way States such as Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, and other States on the frontier, that are increasing enormously in population, would get the benefit of that increase; they would get the benefit at least of the latest tables of illiteracy in those States. As to the Territory of Dakota, the Territory of Washington, and indeed as to all our Territories, the basis of the census of 1880 is utterly unfair.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask my friend from Indiana if while those States are to be increasing in population from 1880 to 1890 they will not be diminishing all the time in the proportion of their illiteracy to the illiteracy of the whole country?

Mr. HARRISON. Possibly.

Mr. HOAR. I do not mean to oppose the point the Senator is making, but there may be some injustice after the census of 1890 is taken which ought to be remedied by having that operate as soon as it taken, in the particular illustration which he makes, which is probably an illustration of States that will get less and not more under the distribution.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree that we can not say that an increase of population implies a proportionate increase in illiteracy. It may be the reverse. But at all events the basis adopted here is an uncertain one; it does not represent the actual basis. If in fact the proportion of illiteracy is diminished, then the injustice would be on one side; if it is increased, it would be on the other.

So it seems to me we should pass from the census of 1880 to that of 1890 at the earliest possible moment, and I think it is fair that there should be in the Territories a census. In the case of Dakota a census was taken this last year. I think it embraces these returns; and I am of the opinion that the Secretary of the Interior as to that Territory, if the bill did not confine it to the census of 1880, would have before him the facts upon which that might be determined.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator has studied all about the population of the Northwest very much more than I have, I know. I have been informed, and I suppose it is correct, that there is a large influx of population into the Northwest from abroad, from Germany and other states of Europe where English is not spoken.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true.

Mr. MORGAN. This bill requires that persons shall be taught in the English language. I suppose the illiteracy which is mentioned here means of course illiteracy in respect to the English language. So I would take it that the large number of persons coming from Germany, for instance, would most of them come as persons who are not English-speaking people and would have to be taught. They can write, but they can not write in English; they can not speak in English.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no doubt what the Senator says is true, yet the emigration coming from European countries is very largely from the north of Europe, from countries where the people have had the advantage of instruction, of course in their own tongue, and I do not suppose they would be classed as illiterates. I do not understand the bill to mean that one shall be able to read and write in the English tongue. I do not think the census tables are made up upon that basis.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know how they are made up; I inquired for information about it.

Mr. HARRISON. But it is clear, I think, that however the proportion might be maintained in the Territories with the increase of population, there would be a large increase of illiterates. What the proportion would be as to the whole population of the United States of course no one can tell; but it seems to me that we are taking too remote a basis or estimate for the Territories, whose conditions as to population are changing with such amazing rapidity.

I do not see any objection to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama; on the other hand, I think it enables us to distribute the fund to the Territories upon a more equal basis than the bill provides.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the bill reported from the committee is not, I think, properly subject to the criticisms which have been made upon it. It is a bill which necessarily establishes proportions, and appropriates the money according to a proportion between the illiteracy of a locality and the whole. Some basis must have been taken, and the only possible basis before the bill was reported was the last census.

It is impossible under the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama to fix that proportion. A census yet to be taken in the future may vary it entirely. Of what necessity is it? This law will always be within the control of Congress. When the fact is developed that the proportion does injustice to any locality, what is the difficulty in the next Congress or in any Congress establishing another basis for ascertaining what is the proportion of illiteracy between one part of the country and another? The bill is not an iron one that can not be changed, but must always be within the power of every succeeding Congress to alter it.

Therefore it appears to me that the suggestion is entirely an immaterial one and will not produce any substantial effect.

Mr. TELLER. At the risk of bringing down upon myself the condemnation of some member of the committee—not that I care anything about it; I rather like to see the courtesies and decencies of the Senate maintained myself—I will venture to suggest that several of the States under a United States law have recently taken a census. The act providing for the census of 1880 contained a provision that in 1885 such of the States as saw fit to take a census might do so, and that one-half of the expense should be paid by the General Government. Certainly several of the States have taken a census of that character. It seems if this provision was not limited to the census of 1880 the Secretary of the Interior would have some discretion to accept the last census. For instance Kansas, I understand, has taken a census, Colorado has taken a census, and other States have taken a census.

Mr. INGALLS. In Kansas a census is taken every year in March.

Mr. TELLER. In Kansas a census is taken every year in March, the Senator says.

Mr. DAWES. A census is taken every five years in Massachusetts.

Mr. TELLER. A census was taken in 1885 in Massachusetts. A great number of States availed themselves of that provision in the act for taking the census of 1880 that they might take a census in five years and the Government would pay one-half the expense.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to make a suggtion?

Mr. TELLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALL. I suggest to my honorable friend from Colorado that although there might have been twelve or fifteen or twenty States which had taken a census, you could not from that fix the proportion unless you took the census of those States as the basis for the whole, and the census of 1880, which extends to all the States, is the only practical basis for the ascertainment in all the States and Territories.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know how many of the States did take a census last year. It may be that it is not practicable; but I think myself the suggestion made by the Senator from Alabama is proper, and I am in favor of his amendment

Mr. HARRISON. I want to suggest to the Senator from Alabama, upon reflection, whether the expense of such a census as he provides for here would not in the Territories equal or very nearly equal the amount of the appropriation in the bill for their benefit, and whether his amendment might not be so modified as to allow the Secretary of the Interior to act upon the school reports, such reports and information as is furnished by the Territorial authorities from time to time. I think a census of Dakota would cost as much as the Senator stated a moment ago would be apportioned to that Territory, certainly more than for the first year on the basis of the census of 1880.

Mr. MORGAN. In proposing the amendment the thought had occurred to me that is suggested by the Senator from Indiana, and I supposed the words "school census" would probably reach it, which the Secretary could obtain through the legislative authorities. I grant that it will be an expensive business, and the only apology I should have for that view of the case is that this is a very expensive proceeding we are in, and we have stricken out of the bill $2,000,000 for the building of school-houses, as originally provided in the bill passed by the Senate before, and I suppose we might take that as a sort of contingent fund out of which we could provide for the persons who would suffer otherwise under the bill.

I do not want to increase the expenses of the Government, and I am quite willing to agree to any modification of the amendment by which it can be ascertained what is the present basis of illiteracy in the Territories or what it will be at the time the bill goes into effect.

The Senator from Florida I have no doubt understands this bill better than I do, but I have had a great misunderstanding of it if I have not rightly understood that the bill goes upon the basis of the number of illiterates that were found in the States over ten years of age at the date of the census that is the basis of the proportion. You ascertain, in order to determine the amount of money that is to be paid to any State or Territory, the number of persons over ten years of age who were illiterate at that time, and that is the basis of the proportion to the whole fund. There is where the difficulty comes in. Dakota had only about 150,000 people in 1880, and now she has 500,000; so that the basis of illiteracy in reference to Dakota which was established in 1880 would be a great injustice to her now. Assuming that the same proportion exists in respect to her 500,000 population that existed in 1880 in respect of her 150,000, still we should find that Dakota was behind some 300 per cent. probably in the amount of money that we are awarding to her under this bill.

As I observed yesterday, if the Senate has got the power to pass this enormous bill it ought to have the measure consistent; its committee ought to be willing to take pains to consider it; and I am quite dissatisfied with the statement made here to-day by Senators in which they seem rather to boast themselves that they did not bring in a bill that agreed with their own convictions as Senators, but they brought in a bill that was passed by the Senate two years ago as their guide. We want the enlightened opinion, the intelligent action of the committee on the bill upon its merits, without reference to how the Senate might have voted heretofore. I shall not say much, or anything indeed, about sending it back to the committee, for fear it might be understood that that was my method of trying to defeat it; but what has been said about the true features of this bill has been said very mildly. The Senate has purged out some of them after great and laborious effort and long debate. But I believe if I was on that committee I could not justify myself after all that has occurred here in not asking that this bill should be recommitted. At all events, I am trying to do what I can to get the injustice out of it.

Mr. CALL. I think the point is so clear that there ought not to be any difficulty here. The bill provides:

SEC. 2. That such money shall annually be divided among and paid out in the several States and Territories in that proportion which the whole number of persons in each who, being of the age of ten years and over, can not write, bears to the whole number of such persons in the United States.

If we are to take the census of Dakota we are to establish that proportion by the census, whether it be a school census or a State census of that Territory, for the whole United States; and the simple question presented by this amendment is whether it is right to take a census of a single Territory and make that the proportion for the whole country, or whether it is better to take the census of the whole United States, although it may have been several years past and may do injustice to some locality. There can be no question between those two propositions, that the only approximate basis that would be correct would be the last census of the whole United States.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama and the observations made by the Senator from Indiana are based upon an entire misapprehension of the objects and the purposes of this bill. It is not intended for the free Territories of the Northwest. It is not intended for the States of the North and the West. They spurn it. I know, sir, I voice the Republicans, the people of the State of Kansas, when I say that they spurn indignantly and with contempt any assumption that they desire a donation from the national Treasury for the purpose of conducting the system of common schools within their borders.

Sir, the State of Kansas since 1861, amid all the perils and privations of her career during the period of the war, with less than 100,000 people when that war broke out and having sent more soldiers into the Union armies than she had voters when the war was declared, and notwithstanding all the subsequent privations of the frontier, droughts, locusts, perils of all descriptions, out of her scanty resources has expended more than $30,000,000 down to this last year of our Lord for the support and maintenance of common schools within her borders. And I am fatigued with the assumption that the Senator from New Hampshire so often presents and that others who advocate this bill so often present, that the people of the North and the West, that the people of Dakota or Montana or any of the other great Territories that are being filled up by immigration from the Northern and Western States, demand a donation from the national Treasury or ask any portion of this $77,000,000, either by way of bribe or by way of alms, to induce them to take care of the matter of education within their own borders.

Let us be just about this matter; let us drop disguises, let us come down to the basis of common sense and common justice, and do not insult the people of the Northern States, do not insult Massachusetts and New Hampshire and New York and Illinois and Wisconsin and Kansas and Nebraska and Iowa and Dakota and Montana by declaring that they want any portion of this donation of $77,000,000 for the purpose of taking care of the common-school system within their borders. We do not want it.

Sir, this bill is essentially dishonest, and under section 2, upon the basis of distribution that is proposed, the States which will take money under this bill are actuated by precisely the same spirit that would induce a man to pick a pocket or to rob a graveyard. When the States to whom this donation is to be given propose to ask us to vote $77,000,000 to be distributed upon the basis of illiteracy, to be determined by ascertaining the number of people within their limits above the age of ten years who can neither read nor write, that is essentially dishonest. It is an act of grand larceny of the Treasury of the United States. They do not intend to take that money for the purpose of educating those people upon whose illiteracy they obtain it. Let there be no misunderstanding about this matter. When the States of the South, for whom this money is intended, come here and ask that they shall obtain it, and that the basis of distribution shall be the number of illiterates above the age of ten years without any maximum, they know perfectly well, and the country knows, that they are obtaining that money under false pretenses. This is a bill nominally intended for the support of the system of common schools in this country.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. INGALLS. With pleasure.

Mr. MAXEY. I beg to say to the Senator who is making that sweeping expression as to the South that the State of Texas does not ask and has not asked for this money, and as represented on the floor of the Senate she will not vote for the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to call attention to a telegram which I received yesterday from the governor of Alabama?

MONTGOMERY, ALA., February 17, 1886.

To JOHN F. MORGAN,
U. S. S., Washington, D. C.:

I see no authority in the Constitution for the propositions of the Blair bill, and am opposed to this insidious effort to transfer to the Federal Government the power to control and regulate education within the States. I indorse your opposition to this bill and believe the people of this State do.

E. A. O'NEAL, Governor.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to ask the Senator from Texas what the amount of the school fund in that State is derived from the large territory of that State which almost all the other States furnished troops to acquire for Texas, save and except possibly Kansas and a few others?

Mr. INGALLS. I hope the Senator from Virginia will allow the answer to that question to be postponed.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to answer that single question.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should like to have an answer.

Mr. MAXEY. There is not a bit of territory in the State of Texas that was ever acquired by the exertion of any one State of this Union; it all belonged to Texas when that State was admitted into the Union, and belongs to it yet. Her school fund is her own property, not embracing a dollar of money derived from the United States.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. How much is it?

Mr. MAXEY. It is very large, and I hope it will be larger.

Mr. INGALLS. Section 2 of this bill says:

That such money shall annually be divided among and paid out in the several States and Territories in that proportion which the whole number of persons in each who, being of the age of ten years and over, can not write, bears to the whole number of such persons in the United States; such computation shall be made according to the census of 1880.

I moved yesterday to amend that section by providing that the basis of distribution should be ascertained by computing the number of such persons between the ages of ten and twenty-one years in each State and Territory, for the reason that I desired that this money should be distributed upon the basis of those persons who being unable to read and write were to receive the benefit of it. That amendment was rejected by a vote, I believe, of 17 to 23; and that was a declaration of the purpose and the intention of those who are promoting this bill, and that is to obtain for the States of the South a vastly greater proportion of this money than they are by any reason or by any equity entitled to.

Who is responsible for the illiteracy in the South of those people who are above the school age? I have heard this measure spoken of as an act of restitution, a contribution to the national conscience fund, as if the North, in overcoming the South and in securing the freedom of the slave and enfranchising the freedmen, was thereby compelled by virtue of that fact to bear the entire burden of educating them up to the condition where they would be properly competent and qualified to exercise the suffrage. Very good; admit that. What part or lot has that great class of illiterates who are above the school age, who were in that condition at the time enfranchisement was declared, in this matter?

Why should the United States of America, why should the people of the North, why should the people of Kansas be called upon, in addition to paying $3,000,000 this last year to educate their own illiterates between the ages of ten and twenty-one, to contribute of their hard-earned resources money to the South, not to educate those between the ages of ten and twenty-one, but to educate those who are far beyond the age of maturity and who were illiterates when the war closed? Who is responsible for that vast illiterate class above the school age in the South? I know, sir, that by the laws of those States they were forbidden to read and write. It was made a penalty subject to fine and imprisonment to teach one of those wretched and helpless creatures to read the Bible, which taught him the means of salvation; and yet we are in 1886 to be asked under the second section of this bill to contribute from the national Treasury this vast sum of $77,000,000, to be disbursed mainly in the Southern States, for the purpose of educating the illiterates, and the basis of distribution is not illiterates of the school age, but illiterates of every age, and I venture to say that one-half of all those persons above the age of ten years who can not read and write are also above the age of twenty-one years.

Now, sir, is there justice in that? If this is proposed as an act of national restitution, if we are called upon to make this contribution by reason of having enfranchised the slave, is that a reasonable basis of computation?

Therefore, Mr. President, so far as the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama is concerned, I see no reason why it should be adopted. It is inconsistent with the theory and purpose of the bill, and I am very sure that for myself and my associates from the North and from the East and from the West I speak their sentiments when I say that none of them desire any portion of this contribution. It is not made because they need it; it is not made because they have asked for it; and if I could have my own views prevail about this matter I would have the State that I represent left out of this bill.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, this is about the most opportune time since the consideration of this bill began to have it understood that Kansas and Alabama and Texas are against it.

We passed this bill two years ago in the Senate, and it went to the House of Representatives. That was some three months before the Congress adjourned at that long session. The bill became very prominent in the party politics of the South in the canvass before the succeeding election in November, and I heard of gentlemen in the State of Virginia who approved it denouncing a Republican Senate for not having passed it in time for the House of Representatives to have duly considered it. They were all in favor of it, though I believe mine was the only vote from that State which was given for it.

Now, the Senator from Alabama has spoken here the better part of two days in opposition to this bill. We know his reasons against it. It has been under consideration twice before this, and at this time he asks, not that we shall consider what he has said and possibly be influenced in our votes by what he has given us as constitutional law, but that there shall be another census, or that the bill shall be recommitted. I want to fasten the responsibility of delay where it properly belongs. I do not want another canvass of falsehood and deception on this bill. Here is the place to have it understood. Three months this bill was pending in the House of Representatives before adjournment, after it had passed the Senate, and the objection of one single man defeated it, and that man himself never asserted that he had made the objection, and never denied it when the allegation was made and the man was present who heard him make the objection.

I can understand why the Senator from Kansas should oppose the bill, and should oppose it on the ground that his State does not want it. They do not need it. They look upon it as a gratuity, and they are so rich that they repel it. I can understand why the Senator from Alabama does not want it for his State. I can understand perfectly well why some States are benefited by their own illiteracy. I can understand why Texas does not want it. She, like Kansas, does not need it, because she has a territory there that she uses for the purposes of public education that the very States in distress gave to her and gave liberty to the people of the State. They do not want it; but were they in the condition of Virginia, they would. I am not ashamed to say here on behalf of as good a people as inhabit the State of Texas or of Kansas, that we do want it; we ask for it, and we think that is due to us to have it.

I shall not go into a discussion of the war question as to who freed the slave; I am glad he is free; but being free, I ask the gentlemen here and elsewhere who considered that it was one of their duties under a higher law to free him, whether it is not one of their duties to come to the rescue of an impoverished people who accept the situation and desire that the freedmen shall be educated. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Persons in the galleries are warned that no sign of approbation or disapprobation is allowed by the rules of the Senate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I only intended to make these few observations. I want the responsibility of the defeat of this bill, if it shall be defeated, fastened exactly where it belongs. I want no more deception about this bill. When it is amended to suit Senators on the floor, or a majority of them, I think we should have a vote upon it. I represent a State that has as much illiteracy in proportion to its population as any other, I suppose, in the Union, except perhaps three or four that had more slaves. I represent a State that has a large number of white children who can not read and write. The Senator from Kansas refers to the fact that people were kept in slavery there and forbidden to read until they could not even understand the mysterious problem of the soul's salvation.

I can recollect, sir, when the public officers were not allowed even to distribute there the mails that contained an abolition paper. I grant that is true. But if he will have the same consideration, the same pious consideration, if I may so express it, for the white children there who can not read and write and the colored children there who can not read and write he will take from this public Treasury this surplus of money about which we have heard so much in political campaigns, and utilize it for that grand and glorious, religious and Christian purpose of enabling them all to read the Holy Bible. You can not appropriate it to any nobler purpose. I have heard that it ought to be put in circulation. I have heard that it ought to be distributed, because that would relieve the pressure and oppression of the public in debt. Can you give it out to any grander or holier purpose than to educate these same children to read that same Bible, which teaches us the mysterious doctrine of salvation?

That is the only answer I propose to make to the Senator from Kansas. I am sorry that he is not willing to accept even that small portion of this fund which would go to his State, and reproaches us who will accept it, but he, I know, is capable of drawing the distinction between Kansas after a war and Virginia after a war, and if he shall take that into the recesses of his soul he will conclude that I am not asking a donation, not asking a gift, but asking Congress to do that which I think is within its power under the Constitution, and which I believe it owes to our people.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, the bill before the Senate is exactly the same that passed this body by more than a two-thirds vote two years ago. It went to the House of Representatives and was never reached on the Calendar. When it was under consideration in the Senate I gave full expression to my views in opposition to it in the long and exhaustive debate which then occurred. Not intending to repeat arguments then made, I rise now to declare my continued and unabated opposition to it, and to enter now, as I did then, my earnest protest against its passage; for in my judgment it is the most pernicious bill introduced into either House of Congress since the war, whether viewed with reference to the powers of Congress under the Constitution to pass such a bill, or to its expediency as a measure of policy.

As a precedent, it will be as utterly destructive of the limitations of the Constitution upon Congressional power, adopted for the preservation of the liberties of the people and the right of local self-government in the States, as if two-thirds of the provisions of the Constitution had been eliminated in a convention of the States. The powers of taxation, which necessarily are unlimited except by the purposes defined in the Constitution, to accomplish which taxes may be levied, have, in order to justify this bill, been enlarged and expanded until the discretion of Congress is their sole boundary, while the power of appropriation is held to be without limit or bounds, with the single exception that the object shall be the "general welfare," and of this Congress is to be the sole and exclusive judge. Unlimited power in Congress to tax, coupled with unlimited power to appropriate, is the theory of this bill, and this, according to the opinion of Justice Miller in the famous Topeka case, reported in 20 Wallace, is the very definition of despotism.

Says that great judge, speaking as the organ of the Supreme Court of the United States:

> It may well be doubted, if a man is to hold all he is accustomed to call his own, all in which he has placed his happiness, and the security of which is essential to that happiness, under the unlimited dominion of others, whether it is not wiser that this power should be exercised by one man than by many. The theory of our Government, State and national, is opposed to the unlimited deposit of power anywhere.

Congress, say the advocates of this bill, is the sole judge of what the "general welfare" requires, and the discretion of Congress is the sole limit of the power of Congress to tax the people and appropriate money to promote the "general welfare."

This proposition, if true, places every dollar's worth of property in this country under the dominion of Congress, without a single limitation upon the power of Congress to tax it not self-imposed, and the truth and correctness of that proposition the advocates of this bill find themselves compelled to maintain in order to justify the bill. Judge Miller, in the opinion I have just read from, discussing and denying the unlimited power of taxation and appropriation, said:

> It must be conceded that there are such rights in every free government beyond the control of the state. A government which recognized no such rights, which held the lives, the liberty, and property of its citizens subject at all times to the absolute disposition and unlimited control of even the most democratic depositary of power, is, after all, but a despotism. It is true it is a despotism of the many, of the majority, if you choose to call it so, but it is none the less a despotism.

At the close of the war, when the blood of the victorious North was hot from recent conflict, when the surging passions of men rather than cool judgment dictated the policy of the hour, what would have been the fate of the South unprotected by the guarantees of the Constitution which this bill proposes to strike down and nullify? A sectional majority in Congress, with power to tax at will and appropriate at will upon its own decision of the requirements of the "general welfare," could constitutionally have taxed the people of the South until they were stripped of every dollar's worth of property they possessed in the world if the argument in support of this bill is sound. It was then that the South felt the value and wisdom of our noble Constitution, for it sheltered us from the storm.

The strong can always take care of themselves, while constitutions and laws are necessary for the protection of the weak against the aggressions of the powerful. Unlimited, uncontrolled Congressional power means the domination of the weaker by the stronger sections of the Union. It was against this condition that the framers of our Constitution sought most sedulously to provide in the enumeration of powers granted to the Federal Government and in the reservation of other powers to the States and the people, thereby intending and hoping to secure equality, independence, and security to all the States and sections alike, whether weak and insignificant or strong and powerful.

The public law of Europe which holds firmly the balance of power, under which feeble and insignificant states repose in perfect security against their more powerful neighbors, was worked out and formulated through centuries of struggle, rivers of blood, and the expenditure of countless millions of treasure. The wise men who framed our Constitution, utilizing this experience, by a system of checks and balances sought to accomplish the same results in a written Constitution for the States of our Union, covering more territory and a greater diversity of soil, climate, production, interests, and population than the states of Europe.

It is not claimed that the power to pass this bill is conferred by any of the amendments to the Constitution adopted since the war. The present distinguished Attorney-General, two years ago a member of this body and the leader of the debate in behalf of this bill, expressly disclaimed the derivation of the power from these amendments or either of them. So we must test the powers of Congress in this regard by the Constitution as it came from the hands of the fathers.

This bill, if passed, will establish a construction of the Constitution which utterly destroys the constitutional balance of power between the States and sections of this Union, and invests with unlimited and uncontrolled power a Congressional majority, which the universal history of all the ages shows will be used by the stronger for the oppression and despoiling of the weaker sections of the country. "The power to tax is the power to destroy," says Chief-Justice Marshall in a memorable case. This great power rests in the hands of Congress, as heretofore understood, subject to certain well-defined limitations in the Constitution, which the theory of this bill utterly ignores and which its influence as a precedent will utterly destroy, leaving in the hands of the majority in Congress the unlimited and uncontrolled power to be wielded, whether under the influence of passion and excitement or of greed and avarice, for the most destructive purposes.

The right of local self-government, so dear to the people of all the States and so fully guaranteed by the Constitution, and especially the ninth and tenth amendments thereto, if this bill becomes a law, based as it is on the theory that Congress may do all things not prohibited in the Constitution required by the general welfare and is the exclusive judge of what the "general welfare" does require, will have received a blow from which there is no recovery. For what local rights have the States or people if not that of controlling the education of their children? Hear what Mr. Madison says on this subject. I read again a portion of the extract from one of Mr. Madison's speeches heretofore read in this debate, and will add that all the research of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] in his able argument on this bill has failed to discover any retraction or modification of what he here says:

> There are consequences—

Says Mr. Madison—

> still more extensive, which, as they follow clearly from the doctrine combated, must either be admitted, or the doctrine must be given up. If Congress can employ money indefinitely to the general welfare, and are the sole and supreme judges of the general welfare, they may take the care of religion into their own hands; they may appoint teachers in every State, county, and parish, and pay them out of their public Treasury; they may take into their own hands the education of children, establishing in like manner schools throughout the Union; they may assume the provision for the poor; they may undertake the regulation of all roads other than post-roads; in short, everything, from the highest object of State legislation down to the most minute object of police, would be thrown under the power of Congress; for every object I have mentioned would admit of the application of money, and might be called, if Conrgess pleased, provisions for the general welfare.

The passage of this bill is an affirmation in the most solemn official form that every subject of state concern, in the language of Mr. Madison, "from the highest object of State legislation down to the most minute object of police, would be thrown under the power of Congress," if Congress should deem it proper to exercise the jurisdiction. For it can not be denied that the argument which sustains this bill will equally well sustain any other assertion of jurisdiction over any of the local affairs of the States.

In order to justify themselves the Democrats who support this bill in this Chamber assert that while Congress has no power or jurisdiction over the common schools of the States, in which I concur most heartily with them, that still Congress has the power to levy and collect taxes from the people for the purpose of expending the money upon common schools in the States, confessedly beyond the jurisdiction of Congress. In other words, that Congress is not confined to the execution of its constitutional powers in levying taxes and appropriating the money, but that objects outside of and beyond the jurisdiction of Congress may be specially provided for by taxation and appropriation when the general welfare requires it. We are not dealing with a surplus in our Treasury, for if we will pay all the bonds subject to call we not only have not a dollar of surplus, but lack millions of dollars of having enough to pay them. So the precedents relied on to establish the power of Congress to appropriate money in the Treasury wherever and whenever the general welfare requires it, and which, in my judgment, signally fails to establish that power over money already in the Treasury, are not in point with or applicable to this bill.

The proposition here is not to apply money in the Treasury or to get rid of a surplus, but it is to lay additional taxes on the people to raise money first and then to appropriate it—the levy of the tax, as well as the appropriation, being to promote objects outside of and beyond the jurisdiction of Congress. I deny the power of Congress to appropriate money already in the Treasury for purposes beyond its jurisdiction, but if I am in error in this, which I do not for one instant believe, I can not be wrong when I deny the power of Congress to levy taxes upon the people and collect money for the purpose of expending it upon objects outside of its powers and jurisdiction, as the common schools of the States are admitted by the Democratic advocates of this bill to be.

The great power of taxation is limited, controlled, and confined by the grants of the Constitution, or it is unlimited except by the discretion of Congress. If the latter, then the Supreme Court of the United States, in the opinion I have quoted, is wrong, and ours is not a free government, but a despotism. Unlimited power of taxation as well as of appropriation is necessary to justify this bill, which dedicates $77,000,000 yet to be raised by taxation and to be expended over a period of eight years, and that to an object which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] and his Democratic associates who support this bill admit is outside of and beyond the jurisdiction of Congress.

All the arguments made and the precedents cited by the advocates of this bill have been directed to the point of establishing the power in Congress to appropriate money already in the Treasury—a surplus—for any purpose which Congress may determine that the general welfare requires. None of them touch the question of the power of Congress to tax the people for the purpose of placing money in the Treasury to be appropriated or bestowed upon objects outside of and beyond the jurisdiction of Congress.

It would seem that the mere statement of the proposition that Congress has no power to levy and collect taxes except to raise money to carry out and execute its constitutional powers ought to be sufficient without an argument to support it; and it is equally plain and clear that the common schools of the States not being under the jurisdiction of Congress, nor their control, management, or maintenance being within the powers of Congress, no power resides in Congress to tax the people to raise money for their support, whatever may be the power of Congress over money lying unused as a surplus in the Treasury over and above the needs of the Government.

I do not propose to repeat the argument made by me on this question when this bill was last before the Senate, but will read here one authority used by me in that debate. I allude to Cooley on Taxation, a book of standard authority in all our courts.

Judge Cooley says:

Taxes are defined as being the enforced proportional contribution of persons and property, levied by the authority of the State for the support of the Government and for all public needs.

Again he says:

They are the property of the citizen, demanded and received by the Government to be disposed of to enable it to carry into effect its mandates and to discharge its manifold functions.

Again he says:

The power of taxation is an incident of sovereignty, and is coextensive with that of which it is an incident. All subjects, therefore, over which the sovereign power of the state extends are, in its discretion, legitimate subjects of taxation; and this may be carried to any extent to which the government may choose to carry it.

After enumerating a number of maxims on this subject, the author says:

All these maxims assume that taxation is laid for the purpose of obtaining a revenue. Within the definitions given, the burden would not be taxation, if revenue were not the purpose.

What is revenue but that which is needed to carry on the Government and enable the Government to execute its constitutional powers? But again, and here is where he covers the whole question:

In considering the legality of the purpose of any particular tax a question of first importance must always concern the grade of the government which assumes to levy it. The "public" that is concerned in a legal sense in any matter of government is the public the particular government has been provided for; and the "public purpose" for which that government may tax is one which concerns its own people, and not some other people having a government of its own, for whose wants taxes are laid. There may, therefore, be a public purpose as regards the Federal Union which would not be such as a basis for State taxation, and there may be a public purpose which would uphold State taxation, but not the taxation which its municipalities would be at liberty to vote and collect. The purpose must in every instance pertain to the sovereignty with which the tax originates; it must be something within its jurisdiction so as to justify its making provision for it. The rule is applicable to all the subordinate municipalities; they are clothed with powers to accomplish certain objects, and for those objects they may tax, but not for others, however interesting and important, which are the proper concern of any other government or jurisdiction. State expenses are not to be provided for by Federal taxation, nor Federal expenses by State taxation, because in neither case would the taxation be levied by the government upon whose public the burden of the expenses properly rests. To provide for such expenses would consequently not be a purpose in which the people taxed would in a legal sense be concerned.

That is what Judge Cooley in his work of standard authority says upon the subject, and it covers this whole ground.

The taxation which is legitimate under our Government is taxation to raise revenue, for what? To enable the Government to execute its constitutional powers, to exercise and perform the functions and duties of its jurisdiction, and to supply its needs for those purposes. Taxation to raise money to bestow on objects and promote purposes outside of and beyond its jurisdiction and powers would not be to raise revenue for the Government, and, Judge Cooley says, would not be taxation, but simply a taking by superior force. Therefore it is that I assert it to be an undeniable proposition that if Congress has the constitutional power to draw money from the people by taxation for the support of the common schools of the States, it must be because the maintenance of the common schools of the States is a public purpose within the powers and jurisdiction of the Government of the United States, for unless they are, no power resides in Congress to sustain them by taxation, and he who supports this bill stultifies himself whenever he denies the power and jurisdiction of Congress over public education in the several States.

I deny this power to the Government of the United States. I believe the common schools of the States are wholly and exclusively under the power and jurisdiction of the several States, and, therefore, being outside of the jurisdiction of the National Government, that that Government has no power to tax the people for their support. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] claims, as I do, that the common schools of the States are wholly within the jurisdiction of the several States and not within that of the National Government; but he says that Congress, although these schools are beyond its jurisdiction and outside of its powers, can tax the people to raise money for their support. Upon this I take issue with him, and say to him that whenever he goes outside the jurisdiction and powers of Congress to find objects for which taxation may be imposed on the people he takes off the limitations of the Constitution upon the taxing power, and vests in the dominant majority in Congress an unlimited, uncontrolled, undefined power of taxation, which the Supreme Court of the United States has said in the opinion I have read from has never been confided in any free government to any depositary of power however democratic, not even to a majority.

No man has advocated this bill and no man can advocate it and justify it without being driven to the position thus condemned by the highest judicial authority in the world. I am not prepared to revolutionize this Government. I am not prepared to establish the despotism of a Congressional majority, and destroy the balance of power between the States and sections of this Union so wisely adjusted in our Constitution.

It is considered by my Democratic friends from the South who support this bill that it is a good thing to have the people in all the States of the Union taxed for the benefit of their constituents, but I beg them to remember that this is but the beginning of this new departure from constitutional methods, and that as surely as time rolls on the "general welfare" will levy its tribute on their people in turn. Once established, this precedent will return to plague you. You had better go on in the good old way. Your people are struggling bravely and successfully with the evils of illiteracy. Their achievements have challenged the admiration of the world, and if encouraged to rely on themselves instead of asking charity from the Government will in good time surmount all difficulties, and be stronger, wiser, and more selfreliant and self-reverent for having accomplished their own redemption and re-establishment.

The plea for the passage of this bill is that the safety of the Republic demands that voters be educated. The Government of the United States has nothing to do with suffrage except to see to it that no State discriminates against any class of citizens in conferring the right of suffrage. The State prescribes the qualifications of voters and says who shall be voters and who shall not be. This is a subject wholly and confessedly within the jurisdiction and powers of the several States, and wholly outside of the jurisdiction of the National Government. Nobody denies this. My friends on this side of the Chamber who support this bill agree with me that public education is a matter wholly within the power and jurisdiction of the States and wholly outside the jurisdiction of the General Government. When the entire subject-matter, both suffrage and education, are thus wholly matters of State jurisdiction and wholly outside of the jurisdiction of the National Government, I can not see how it is that the National Government is to take hold of it.

I am here told that the "general welfare" requires that the National Government leave its own constitutional sphere of action and go into that of the States with their consent. I can not think that the general welfare will be promoted by a violation of the Constitution, nor can the States constitutionally consent to an assumption of their powers and duties by the National Government. The whole theory and framework of our Government is founded and built upon States possessed of the powers reserved to them in the Constitution and rests upon them as pillars, and if these pillars are to be wasted and frittered away by any process, the superstructure will come down. An indissoluble union of indestructible States, indestructible even by their own consent, is the character of our Government. The powers of Congress can not be enlarged by the consent of the States, nor can those of the States be diminished by the consent of Congress. An amendment to the Constitution alone can make these changes.

The States can not consent to a usurpation of their powers by Congress any more than Congress can rightfully go into the reserved domain of the States. The machinery of our Governments, both State and National, is adjusted to the Constitution and will not work without jarring and friction outside of it. All the powers of Congress, and no more and no less, and all the rights and powers of the States, and neither more nor less, must be exercised respectively by them in order to a harmonious working of our system. For Congress to go outside of its powers and jurisdiction to perform functions alloted by the Constitution to the States in the management or administration or maintenance of their common-school systems would be a violation of the rights and powers and duties of both the State and National Governments. What the Constitution has ordained shall be kept separate, apart, and distinct can not be mixed and mingled even by the joint action and consent of both Congress and the States without violence to our theory and Constitution of Government.

The astonishing proposition is asserted by some of the advocates of this bill that the Government of the United States can tax the people of the United States to raise money to aid the common schools of the States, but can not follow that money and see to its administration and disbursement. It is difficult to believe that they are serious in making this assertion. If Congress is performing a duty in passing this bill the duty certainly does not end with handing the money over to the States. It is a continuing duty to see to it that it is applied to the purpose for which it is raised. This duty implies a discretion in Congress as to the mode of administration, the agents and instrumentalities; indeed, as to the entire method and all the processes of its use, handling, disbursement, &c., and all these things together constitute the management and current business and running of the public schools.

The bill now before the Senate, which in my judgment concedes the jurisdiction and power of the National Government over the common schools of the States, to be taken charge of either wholly or partially, as Congress may determine, does in fact largely direct how these schools shall be administered, going so far even as to prescribe studies to be taught in them. The bill exercises the powers, or many of them, over the schools proposed to be aided which a reader of many of the speeches made in advocacy of the bill is led to believe could not be claimed under it by the Government.

While Democratic advocates of the bill are claiming that the Government has no right or power or jurisdiction over the common schools under this bill, and have no power to follow the money and see to its application and administration, exactly the contrary is claimed by my Republican friends on the other side of the Chamber. I will read an extract from a speech of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] now in the chair on this bill made two years ago, which I think will not be denied to be representative of the views of his party associates on the subject. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said:

> If the United States have the right to appropriate the money, they have the right to say upon what conditions the money shall be expended. If they say we will aid the South or the Southern States to educate their illiterate children, then the United States have the power and the right to set out the principles and conditions or limitations of that grant. The greater includes the less; and if the power is given to make these appropriations at all, the power is also given to say for whose benefit the money shall be expended, how it shall be expended, where and when and how apportioned, and for what purposes. That is as clear a proposition as can be shown in Euclid or any other mathematical work.

I will also read from the debate of two years ago an extract from an editorial which I find in the speech of Mr. Bayard, then a member of the Senate, taken from a paper published in Rhode Island, of which Senator Anthony, of that State, then a member of this body but since dead, was the editor and proprietor:

> The more honest, as the more truthful way of putting it would perhaps be to say that the necessity has arisen for the exercise of ultra-constitutional but necessary authority, and that it is a logical consequence of the emancipation and enfranchisement of the negro, these being the inevitable results of the war of the rebellion.
> It is not at all irrelevant, however, to inquire whether the means will secure the end. The committee finds that five-twelfths of the school population of the country are growing up in ignorance of the English alphabet; that in eighty-six cities, containing a school population of over 2,000,000, over one-third of the children never enter a school-room. New York city has 114,000 children not enrolled at all, and of a school population of 385,000, there is an average attendance of only 132,000. Some of our New England villages exhibit statistics which are simply appalling. The South excuses herself on account of emancipation and poverty; the North explains herself by the inundation of a foreign population. Whatever the causes, and they are clear enough, the facts are to be admitted and faced. The prevailing sentiment is, that the State shall no longer be responsible for the education of her children, but they shall be educated by the National Government, the State doing so much as Congress shall require. This is to be understood, however, when the Federal Government undertakes this business, as of right and duty it has assumed, and the States have conceded that it has full and sovereign authority. It will be bound to look out for the "general welfare" in this behalf, according to its best judgment and highest wisdom. The schools must conform to its idea of virtue and its standard of education.

The Senator from Ohio is unquestionably correct in the opinion he expresses as to the right and power of the Government to follow and superintend the administration and disbursement of money it appropriates, and Senator Anthony undoubtedly foreshadowed, in the well-considered editorial just read, what the Republican party will claim in respect to this subject if the Government enters upon this career of interfering with the common schools of the States. Which construction shall prevail, that of the Democratic supporters of this bill, who claim that all the United States Government has the power to do is to hand the money over to the States to be controlled and managed exclusively by them, or that of the Republican supporters of the bill, that the passage of the bill would be the recognition of plenary power in the United States Government over the entire subject of common schools in the States, and enable the Government to exercise its sovereign will and pleasure in administering them?

A direct antagonism on this point exists between the Democratic and Republican Senators who support this bill, as the debate throughout abundantly shows; yet both agree in pushing the bill through. This unsettled difference of opinion will still remain if the bill shall become a law, and will be the fruitful source of acrimonious and heated sectional discussion hereafter. That clause of the bill which retains the power in Congress to alter, amend, or repeal the bill will always preserve the subject open for debate, amendment, and agitation. It will be a constant source of irritation under the handling of demagogues, who will not fail to use it for all the mischief there is in it in stirring up strife between the colored and white people of the South.

It will be the basis of Congressional investigations into the school systems of the South upon alleged discriminations against colored people in the administration of the fund appropriated, charged for political effect. It will cause the administration of the public schools of the States to be a distinct issue in all political campaigns, and be the most potent and effective means of inciting anew and keeping alive for political effect race issues, now being so happily solved under State jurisdiction. It will be a perennial source of trouble, of agitation, of unrest, of irritation, and harassment throughout the South. One construction of the powers of the Government over State schools under Democratic administration and another and different construction under a Republican administration will subject the education of the youth of the country to all the vicissitudes and changes occurring in the ups and downs of political warfare.

These and many other evils are plainly to result from the passage of this bill. Besides, the relaxation of effort and interest for and in behalf of education among the people of the States will surely eventuate in the end in the assumption by the General Government of full power, jurisdiction, and charge of the subject of education in all the States.

No greater misfortune, in my judgment, could befall the people of this country or the cause of education than would be involved in this result. The fund proposed in this bill is to be taxed out of the people and returned back to them, less the cost of collection and return. Why not retain the money while they have it, and at the same time retain the control of their school systems as they now have them?

Mr. President, I see only evil in this bill; and while I have not intended to go into a general discussion of its provisions as I have done heretofore, I could not refrain from saying this much before the vote is taken.

Mr. DOLPH. I desire to present some amendments that I propose to offer to the pending bill in order that they may be printed before we meet again to-morrow, as I do not see any chance of reaching them for consideration this afternoon. I ask that they may be read, as they are brief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be read if there be no objection.

The SECRETARY. The first proposed amendment is to add to section 1 the following:

And provided further, That no money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any State until three-fourths of all the States have so accepted the provisions of this act.

The next proposed amendment is to add to section 2:

Until and including the year 1890, and afterward according to the census of 1890: Provided, That the District of Alaska shall be considered a Territory within the meaning of this act; and the money apportioned to said district shall be expended annually under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in the manner provided for the expenditure of other appropriations for educational purposes in said District.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendments will be printed if there be no objection.

Mr. EVARTS obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator from New York to yield to me for a moment. I propose an amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Alabama and I ask that it may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. As it is somewhat late, if the Senator from New York will yield, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York has the floor.

Mr. EVARTS. If it is intended that the vote shall be taken upon this bill to-night I shall not occupy the time of the Senate at all, as I am heartily and perfectly desirous that the bill shall be passed; but if it is not the intention of the Senator from New Hampshire or of the Senate that it should proceed to a vote, I may wish to make some remarks upon the subject.

Mr. BLAIR. I think that the intimation of the Senator from New York that he may offer remarks upon the bill to the Senate would produce a general inclination to adjourn in order to have an opportunity to listen to him to-morrow. I understand, too, that there may be other gentlemen who desire to be heard further, and if a motion to adjourn should be made I should not resist it.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator yield to a motion for an executive session? I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] having the floor, the Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eleven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have not concluded my remarks, but I am entirely willing that the question of order shall be decided now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] will state his point of order.

Mr. COBB. My point of order, Mr. Speaker, is that there is now pending before the House a bill providing, I think, for everything contained in the amendment proposed by my colleague. This bill, which I hold in my hand and will send to the Chair, provides that all laws with reference to the disposition of our public lands, except the homestead law, shall be repealed, and it especially provides that these lands shall not be sold at public or private sale, but shall only be disposed of by homesteading. While I am in favor of my colleague's proposition, I do not wish the pending bill encumbered with matters which may provoke discussion and obstruct or delay its passage in this or the other end of the Capitol.

I may state further that this House at the last session of Congress passed a bill in substance the same as that which I now send to the Chair, and probably such a bill will be passed again during this Congress. The last section, as I think the Chair will find, covers the proposition embraced in my colleague's amendment; indeed, I may say that the whole bill affects this question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that there are pending in the House bills providing for the repeal of all laws now in force, with the exception of the homestead law, for the disposition of public lands; but I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that it is not assumed there is any bill now pending in the House which provides for the application of the provisions of the homestead law to lands heretofore granted by Congress, and which may be restored to the public domain. The effect of my proposition is not to reach the entire public domain, but only this particular body of land heretofore granted, and which I propose, when restored to the public domain, shall be restored only upon the condition of being occupied as homesteads by actual settlers.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman's proposition is correct and this point is well taken, then it is almost impossible to submit an amendment to a bill which in some form or other is not embraced in some proposition pending before the House.

I admit there is a bill pending to repeal the desert-land law and the timber-culture law and the pre-emption law—I concede all that; and the result necessarily will be the law remaining in force will be the homestead law. But there is no bill declaring that upon the forfeiture of a grant of public lands heretofore made the homestead law shall apply to it. That is the only point presented—simply as to this particular body of land heretofore granted by Congress, that upon the declaration of forfeiture by Congress those lands shall be controlled by the principles of the homestead law. I think if the narrow view necessarily taken of this subject by the point of order is good, it will be almost impossible to submit an amendment to the House that will not be subject to the same point.

Mr. COBB. I do not so regard it. This bill now pending, and to which this amendment is offered, provides that these lands, when forfeited, shall become a part of the public domain and be subject to the laws governing the public domain, and therefore the homestead, pre-emption, and other laws would apply to these lands from the very moment the forfeiture takes place. They would apply in all cases suggested by the gentleman. In other words, they become a part of the public domain, and are governed by the rules and regulations affecting the public domain. The bill is this: After repealing all the provisions relative to the construction of said railroad or telegraph line, it provides that all the lands granted be, and the same are hereby, restored to the public domain. They are made subject to disposal under the general laws of the United States as though said grant had never been made. Of course this bill, when passed, will restore these lands to the public domain, and they will be affected by any general law which affects other portions of the public domain. I think the gentleman's point of order is not well taken, and I believe the point of order should be sustained.

The SPEAKER. From such examination as the Chair has been able to give to the bill sent up by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] it appears to be a general bill, applicable to all the public lands of the United States, whereas the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] applies only to this particular body of lands heretofore granted to a railroad company. The Chair thinks the best test which can be applied in determining a question of this character is to ascertain whether or not the adoption of the amendment would either absolutely or substantially supersede the necessity for the passage of some bill which is pending. It is evident that the adoption of this amendment could not cover the subject embraced by the bill which the gentleman from Indiana has sent up. The amendment would apply this rule only to the lands in the particular bill now under consideration and leave all the other lands of the country just as the law now leaves them—to be affected hereafter by the passage of the bill which the gentleman sent up. The Chair thinks the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not know what the purpose of the Committee on the Public Lands may be; and if I can have the ear of my colleague I will be able to determine whether I am justified in occupying further the attention of the House. The question I wish to put to my colleague is this, Whether it is proposed during this morning hour to put this bill on its passage, or is it intended to carry it over for further debate?

Mr. COBB. I desire to put the bill on its passage. Of course that will depend upon the temper of the House. I conclude the provisions of the bill, unless some amendment is proposed, will not take up much of the time of the House; that is, they will not provoke discussion. In other words, I think we can pass the bill before the hour expires.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not the gentleman intend to discuss the substitute offered to the bill?

Mr. COBB. That has been discussed, or it was yesterday.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it is not intended to discuss this subject further upon the main point presented, then I will occupy but a moment further to state my own position in regard to it. I shall be brief, because I do not wish to embarrass the passage of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed with his remarks.

Mr. HOLMAN addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I concur in a portion of the remarks made by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] on yesterday with regard to the importance of legislation to preserve what remains of the public domain, especially that which is fit for agricultural purposes, for actual settlers; in other words, to provide lands for the landless and homes for the homeless. But I must express my surprise at the extraordinary position taken by that distinguished and learned gentleman this morning with reference to the minority report of this committee and the substitute which the minority offer. The gentleman certainly loses sight of a very important consideration in questions of this kind, to wit, the nature and character of the law of forfeitures.

Let me say, too, in this connection, that while I have very little doubt of the power of Congress to declare a forfeiture to the extent the majority of the committee has reported, or that which is tantamount thereto, a repeal and revocation of the grant, yet a mere forfeiture to the extent recommended by the minority of the committee report would go for naught, would have no more force or effect, in my judgment, with the learning I have as a lawyer, than to whistle against the wind.

There is a question, however, of great moment in this connection, growing out of the peculiar phraseology of the proviso in the act of 20th April, 1871, authorizing this company to place a mortgage on the land granted. Now it may be, and in fact as the language literally imports is, the right of these mortgagees to foreclose the mortgage on the land coextensive with the road constructed at the time they see proper to foreclose; for the language is:

> That portion of said road which shall have been constructed at the time of the foreclosure of said mortgage.

That is, it shall operate on all lands conterminous with constructed roads at the time of the foreclosure of the mortgage.

That presents a question of importance from this consideration: Now, when a forfeiture is declared, or a revocation of the grant, where no road has been constructed, and the land is thrown open to homestead settlement or entry under the general laws, and is taken up by homestead settlers and improvements made, in course of time their rights, their homes may be jeopardized in consequence of the rights vested by this language in the bondholders under the mortgages upon these lands. This consideration induced me to examine this question critically, and though I may be wrong I have reached certain conclusions. Forfeiture, Mr. Speaker, has a well-defined meaning. The law abhors forfeitures, and hence in no case will one be sustained except the right to it clearly exists. A forfeiture is not like unto a judgment which results at the end of a litigation or legal controversy. It is a common-law, not a statutory, method, by which a grantor of an estate upon condition subsequent gets the title back on account of a failure by the grantee to perform the condition.

In the case of an individual grantor, all that is necessary for him to do to reinvest himself with the title in case of a breach of the condition is to go upon and claim his estate, which is called a re-entry. In the case of the king, under the English common law, in lieu of re-entering in person he had the process of office found—a sort of office judgment which had the effect of reinvesting the Crown with the title. But if there was a controversy, mark you, as to whether the grantee had performed the condition or the grantor had prevented full performance, then the grantor, whether king or peasant, was put to his suit, his action in court, for the recovery of the estate. If the grantor, instead of relying upon his common-law right of forfeiture, substitutes other remedies and reservations in the deed, he must rely on them and not on forfeiture.

In the case of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad grant there are many conditions, and the reservations of power on the part of the Government, as grantor, are expressed in the twentieth section in these words:

> Congress may at any time, having due regard for the rights of said Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Now, the only reservation which the company makes, or, in other words, the only limitation upon the reservation of the Government, is that due regard shall be had for the rights of this company.

What, then, are the rights of this company as between it and the Government? At most, only to have the lands conterminous with the constructed and completed road. The committee concedes this to the company. But the act of Congress of April 20, 1871, authorized the Company to mortgage the lands granted to secure bonds to be issued and sold, and now the holders of the bonds which were thus secured and sold claim that they have a vested right in all the lands granted, and that the Government has no legal right to reclaim those lands and restore them to the public domain. Lee us see. The following in the granting act is strong language, and it is claimed with some plausibility that it constitutes an irrevocable dedication of the lands to the building of the road:

> The United States may do any and all acts and things which may be needful and necessary to insure a speedy completion of the said road.

Said act further provides that—

> The better to accomplish the object of this act, namely, to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line and keep the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times, but particularly in time of war, the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, Congress may at any time, having due regard to the rights of said Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

When we consider the entire granting act in all its parts, this language is but indicative of the great object which the Government desired to attain by making the grant. But it is manifest that it was not intended that the grant should be an unconditional estate in fee. Such a construction would be utterly inconsistent with the reservations of power over the lands granted. The grant was made to aid in the construction of a railroad westward on the nearest practicable route along the thirty-fifth parallel of north latitude to the Pacific Ocean. The lands in the State of California, which were withdrawn in accordance with the map of definite location of the road, are situated north of thirty-five and extending to or into the thirty-eighth parallel of north latitude; and although a Secretary of the Interior decided that this departure from the line indicated in the deed or granting act by the grantor was lawful, I can not sanction such a doctrine. The proviso touching the bondholders, which I have just read, is not very perspicuous in its language. The granting act is referred to, and hence the two must be construed and considered as different parts merely of one and the same act. "If the company shall hereafter suffer any breach of the conditions of the (granting) act," &c., is the first proposition in the proviso, and, if taken literally, would imply that the grantor would commit the breach; whereas its true meaning, to be gathered from the whole act, is that if the company commits a breach of the conditions, &c.

Next, the proviso declares that in that event the rights of the bondholders under the mortgages in respect to the lands shall extend only to so much thereof as shall be conterminous with or appertain to that part of said road which shall have been constructed.

Then, instead of stopping here, which would have made the meaning beyond question, these words follow, "at the time of the foreclosure of said mortgage;" language which is utterly inconsistent with every preceding proposition in the proviso and every reservation in the granting act. To hold that Congress intended just what this language literally imports would place it in the power of the trustees and bondholders, by never foreclosing their mortgages, to annul all the reservations over the lands granted and convert the grant into an absolute and unconditional one.

Congress must therefore have meant that if the company failed to perform the conditions, and the United States in consequence proceeded to take the lands from the company, the mortgagees should have a right to foreclose on all the lands conterminous with the constructed road. The object of authorizing the mortgage on the land was to raise money with which to construct the road; and it is therefore equitable for the Government to limit itself to reclaiming only the lands where no road has been constructed. This is, in my opinion, what was intended by the proviso.

The act authorizing the company to mortgage the lands granted is so intimately connected with the granting act that it may be considered a part, a section of it. Being a part, the whole act must be construed so as to harmonize and furnish a field of operation for each particular provision, if it can be done. The reservation of a right to the Government to repeal the granting act, having due regard for the rights of the company, was known to the mortgagees when they wrote the mortgages. The bondholders are chargeable with that which apppears upon the face of the legislative enactment which authorizes the issue of the bonds. I suppose that no lawyer here will dispute this proposition. Then, as they had notice that the Government, while consenting that the lands might be mortgaged, reserved in express terms the right to terminate the grant whenever the company failed to comply with their part of the contract, therefore the bondholders and mortgagees have not in my opinion a vested right in any lands except such as are conterminous with the road constructed and completed at the time the Government declares a dissolution of the contract and a resumption of the title to unearned lands.

There is another consideration which tends strongly to show that such was the intention of Congress. Lop off the words "at the time of the foreclosure of said mortgage;" strike them out of the proviso as meaningless, and the lien of the bondholders under it will be identical with the rights of the company as against the Government as grantors, and harmony of the otherwise conflicting provisions of the act is secured. I am therefore persuaded that the words "at the time of the foreclosure of said mortgage" are mere redundant words of description, and in fact mean "at the time when the grant is terminated."

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another answer to the claim of the bondholders. I find in the report of the committee several propositions of law the correctness of which I do not sanction, but I have no good reason to dispute their statement of the facts as found by them. I will therefore ask the Clerk to read a passage which I have marked on page 4 of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

These bonds were all taken and are now owned by the parties interested in the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé and the Saint Louis and San Francisco Companies, and the capital stock is now owned by these two companies; and the Atlantic and Pacific road, and all the property, rights, and franchises of the company, are virtually owned and controlled by these two corporations. They hold the mortgage interest complete, all of the road which is completed, and operate it after it is so completed. We believe that the tripartite agreement above referred to was entered into with a full understanding by all the parties that the Atlantic and Pacific was to maintain a nominal existence merely so as to enable these two corporations to secure the benefit of the land grant to the extent they desire under the act passed by Congress April 21, 1871, to enable the Atlantic and Pacific Company to mortgage its road. They caused the mortgages named to be executed, and the bonds to be issued, for the individuals composing these two companies owned the capital stock of the Atlantic and Pacific Company; thus giving them complete control of the latter company. They bought the bonds so issued, and now own them, and these corporations guaranteed their payment. They are, therefore, both debtor and creditor in this transaction.

Mr. OATES. Now, if it be true that these two corporations owned the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, they stand in the shoes of the grantees, and can claim no more than their assignors; and if they also caused the mortgages to be made, and are the owners of all the bonds, it is quite clear that their lien upon the lands is limited to the lands conterminous with the completed road. They would be subrogated to the rights of the grantees, the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, which still retains a nominal existence.

Now, the reservation to the company in the language of the twentieth section, "with due regard to the rights of said company," means just what the majority of the committee in their report have conceded; that if there is a breach of conditions and a consequent termination or revocation of the grant, they should have the lands conterminous with the portion of road they had constructed. It can not mean anything else. And the fact that this road was constructed after the limitation expressed in the grant amounts to nothing, in my judment, for the plain reason which I will state. Every gentleman who is acquainted with the horn-books of the law, who understands its elementary principles, knows that estates upon condition are of two kinds; an estate upon condition precedent, the title in which can not vest until the condition precedent is performed; and an estate upon condition subsequent, the title to which vests the moment the grant is made. In the latter case, although the grantee fails to perform the condition at the time and in the manner prescribed in the deed, that does not in itself forfeit or terminate his estate; that does not cause the title to revert to the grantor. The title still resides in the grantee; the estate is still his until the grantor acts. The right which the grantor has to re-enter in the case of individuals, and thereby reinvest himself with the title, is not regarded as property so far as to enable him to sell or transfer it. His heirs, or his successor, alone can exercise that right if he himself fails to do so during his existence. But suppose he never does re-enter, or, in the case of the Government, declare a dissolution of the contract and a resumption of the title—for that is the only office and effect of an act passed here to declare what is called in this bill a forfeiture—to reinvest the Government with the title to the lands granted? Until this is done, where is the title to the estate? I ask any legal gentleman whether he will dispute the proposition that it rests and resides in the grantee? So long as the title rests and resides in the grantee, the estate is his property. In the case of individuals, whenever the grantor re-enters he is reinvested with the whole estate; and no improvements nor complication placed upon it by the grantee can prevent its reinvesting entire.

But in the case of these peculiar grants to railroad corporations there is in every one of them a provision that when the conditions are performed as to certain specified sections of the grant—20, 30, or 50 miles—the company shall be entitled to patents for lands conterminous with such constructed road. This apportions the grant; so that whenever the Government, for a breach of condition, sees proper to declare a forfeiture of the grant or a resumption of title, it does so only as to that part where the conditions have not been performed.

So long as the Government permits the company to go on and perform its conditions out of time the company has the right to the lands conterminous with the conditions thus performed.

And I say this in reply to the position of the gentleman from Indiana and those who have reported the substitute in this case. The right of this company I maintain is a right to have the lands conterminous with the completed road under the original act. The granting act retained to the Government the right, on breach of conditions by the company, to declare forfeiture at any time. It never was intended, in my judgment, to grant to this company the right to place mortgages on the lands which would extend the right of the mortgagees beyond the right of the company. As I may be wrong in this opinion, and if I am wrong, then if these lands are thrown open to homestead entry and settlement it will result in great hardship to these settlers hereafter, because this corporation or its successor or the mortgagees may bring suit for the recovery of these lands. Therefore it had better be put in such shape as will settle it, so that when settlers go upon the lands and acquire homes there and make improvements they will have security against being ousted. I therefore deem it to be both cautious and wise that the House should adopt an amendment of the character of that which I shall offer at the proper time.

A MEMBER. Offer it now.

Mr. OATES. Very well; I will offer it now and let it be pending if that be deemed best. I am not aware whether it is now in order or not, as there is a substitute and an amendment already pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state there is a substitute pending, and there is also pending an amendment to the text of the original bill proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. If the gentleman from Alabama proposes to amend the substitute that is in order.

Mr. OATES. No; I propose to amend the bill.

The SPEAKER. If he proposes to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana that would be in order. But an independent amendment to the bill itself would not now be in order.

Mr. OATES. I will read the amendment I intend to propose as part of my remarks for the purpose of explaining it to the House. It is as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

"Provided, That any person interested in, or injuriously affected by, the passage of this act, may, at any time within one year after the approval of the same, bring a suit in any circuit court of the United States exercising jurisdiction over the Territory or the district in which the subject of controversy is, and all rights of action given hereby which are not commenced within said year shall be forever barred."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to add this provision at the proper time to the pending bill. I think it ought to be adopted for the reason that it opens the way to any person injuriously affected by this legislation, so that if these bondholders have rights they can be adjudicated in the courts. If this corporation has rights they will have their opportunity. At the same time if such rights are not brought to the attention of the country, if they are not enforced by bringing suits within one year, it is a statute of limitations which forever bars their right of action. The settlers and homesteaders on these lands under such provision will find repose under quiet titles.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. When do these mortgages expire?

Mr. OATES. I am informed not until 1910.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. In default of payment of interest can the bondholders under the terms of the mortgage bring action to foreclose?

Mr. OATES. No action, I am informed, has been brought to foreclose under the mortgage, the interest having been paid.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is there anything to prevent——

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. When can they bring suit under the amendment?

Mr. OATES. They have one year.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is there anything to prevent the bondholders under the mortgage, when the bond falls due, bringing suit to foreclose the mortgage?

Mr. OATES. I think there is, after one year.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Would it not only be an accumulative remedy by which they could file a bill to quiet title? Is it to prevent bringing suit, when the mortgage falls due, in equity to have that mortgage foreclosed?

Mr. OATES. You mean in the event the company builds the road beyond the present terminal point and they enter suit to foreclose the mortgage upon that portion of the grant?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. If I understand the facts, this road is completed for a certain number of miles. The right of way is still given by this bill. It only applies to the lands beyond the point of present completion. There is a provision in the amended act by which the mortgagees have a right to foreclose on such lands as are conterminous to the road at the time of the foreclosure of the mortgage.

Mr. OATES. That is in the proviso.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Now, will the amendment which you offer prevent a bondholder, at the time when his bond becomes due, in case the road is operated farther out, from taking action to foreclose the mortgage and have the land which is then conterminous to the increased completed portion of the road sold subject to that mortgage? I ask that for information.

Mr. OATES. That is a feature which I have not carefully studied. I will only say my present impression is it will bar the action.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. My idea is that if we are to open these lands to homestead settlement under a doubtful title it would be an unwise act on the part of Congress. When do I understand these mortgage bonds to be due?

Mr. OATES. They are due in 1910. But I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that my desire in offering this amendment is to avoid any defect in the title. I think the statute of limitations would protect the settlers if no suits were commenced within the one year.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. That is the point I had in mind, whether the statute is sufficient to protect the homestead settler under the mortgage which exists, provided we throw these lands open.

Mr. OATES. I think it would.

Mr. PERKINS. Let me ask the gentleman from Alabama a question, whether this Atlantic and Pacific Company did not as a matter of fact construct its road to the western boundary of Missouri and several miles into the Territory a good many years ago?

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir; the report discloses that.

Mr. PERKINS. And is it not a matter of history that all or nearly all of the land in Missouri has been disposed of by the company, and that settlers have gone on it?

Mr. OATES. I think that is set forth in the report.

Mr. PERKINS. Then I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama if by either of the bills, that of the majority or minority of the committee, these settlers are protected in any way in their rights.

Mr. OATES. I think so.

Mr. PERKINS. I would be glad if the gentleman from Alabama would point out any provision in the bill which protects them.

Mr. OATES. They are certainly protected, because the bill of the committee does not propose to interfere with any of the lands conterminous with the completed portions of the road.

Mr. PERKINS. Here is the language of the bill:

Provided this act of forfeiture shall not affect the rights of those claiming under any mortgage made by the said company by virtue of the act approved April 20, 1871, &c.

Mr. OATES. If the gentleman will look at the beginning of the bill reported by the committee—he is reading now from the substitute—he will find that it declares a forfeiture, in my opinion I may be permitted to say not in proper language, but a forfeiture nevertheless, which amounts to a repeal or revocation of the grant where no road has been built.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question.

Mr. OATES. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. If the right has not accrued to these bondholders by any failure on the part of the company to meet the payments due to them in interest or otherwise, how can any rights accrue under this act?

Mr. OATES. The amendment which I propose gives to all persons who are injuriously affected the right to go into the courts.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. But how can they be injuriously affected or come within the provisions of the act if this interest is paid and other conditions on which they hold the bonds complied with?

Mr. OATES. If they have a vested right, of course they are protected and will under the amendment I offer have a right to have their rights passed upon and adjudged by the courts of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve my time.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some misunderstanding in the minds of gentlemen upon the other side as to the provisions of this bill with reference to that portion of the line within the Indian Territory. If I can have their attention for a few moments, I believe I can satisfy them upon that point. The Indian Territory is not a part of the public lands of the United States, and is not contemplated as such by the law. None of the land laws are extended over the Indian Territory, and therefore it is not affected by this grant.

The third section of the act provides what is granted in the way of the public domain. The second section grants the right of way, while the third section grants the lands. Now it is provided that the lands in the Territory and the States—that is, the public lands—are granted. Under the rulings of the Departments of the Government, as well as the courts, the Indian Territory has been regarded as a Territory of the United States. It is a separate and distinct portion of the lands of the continent set apart for the Indians. It is held, therefore, in larger part by deeds and treaties, and it can not be the subject of a grant, not being a part of the public domain.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of this business has expired.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. PETERS for fifteen days, on account of important business; and to Mr. SWINBURNE for four days, on account of sickness.

MISSOURI PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to submit the report of the minority of the committee on the bill (H. R. 5874) reported to-day by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. What time does the gentleman desire in which to file the report?

Mr. BLISS. Within one week.

Mr. CRISP. I shall have to object to that length of time, as I hope to get the case up on the next day when the committee is called, which would probably cut it off.

Mr. BLISS. The gentleman can set the time. I think I can submit the report on it by Saturday.

Mr. CRISP. I have no objection to that length of time.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the gentleman from New York will have leave to file the views of the minority.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, for the consideration of the special order, the bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to inquire of the Chair how much time each side of this debate has remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has computed the time up to the close of the debate yesterday, and finds that six hours have been consumed by those supporting the bill and seven hours and thirty minutes by the opponents of the bill.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, I believed for twenty years that Fitz-John Porter was a traitor and that he deserved to be hanged. I accepted this belief because it was the public opinion of the loyal North, and my whole heart was with them. Now I believe he was an honest man and a loyal soldier, and I reached this conclusion when it became my duty as his representative to examine the evidence, and I learned the facts. The examination was tedious. There was the testimony in two trials and the vast accumulations besides. Fitz-John Porter determined at the start to regain his good name, and all these years gathered every fact and every utterance which would recreate the 29th day of August, 1862, when he lost it. The case is so voluminous that I am not inclined to find fault with any who, exempt from this official obligation, shrink from the task of examination and have determined to swim with the popular current of their section. But this examination I have made, and I can not, as an honest man, shrink from its results, and I state them to-day to the committee partly to atone for the bitter words I have heaped upon the man whom I believed to be a traitor, and partly because I wish to show to those who sent me here, some of whom do not approve of my action, that I acted in this case not from impulse, but upon reason and conviction.

First. Consider the facts in the case and the presumption to be derived from them. Look first at the facts before the 29th day of August, 1862. Fitz-John Porter started well. His ancestry was good. His father and grandfather fought in the battles of the country, and they created those family traditions of military honor which the son inherited. Starting with these traditions, he was a good boy, studious and dutiful; he was a good youth, and by his gentleness and his courage won popularity among his fellows, while his success in the exercises of the academy secured for him the approbation of his instructors. He was a good soldier, and the Mexican war soon gave him the opportunity to show his metal. He was in that wonderful little army which subdued a nation and had private soldiers who carried in their knapsacks, all unknown, the stars which they afterward wore as generals.

Yet in such an army Porter acquired conspicuous distinction. He was very brave and he was very prudent—a model officer. And when he lay in the hospital in the city of Mexico wounded in the assault, he solaced his confinement with the knowledge that the distant Government whose commission he bore recognized him as the most promising among its younger officers. With this record he was immediately and naturally called to positions of highest responsibility in the war of the rebellion. How well he discharged them his opponents on this floor have acknowledged. The hero of the City of Mexico became the hero of Gaines's Mill and Malvern Hill; and the Fifth Army Corps, as they rested under the Virginia sky on the 29th day of August, 1862, had not a private in the ranks who did not thrill with the conviction that his commander was the consummate flower of the American Army and its pride. This was the record of Fitz-John Porter up to and on the morning of August 29. Is there anything in it inconsistent with the theory of his innocence on that afternoon?

Now look at the facts which came after this date. On the 30th day of August he received an order to fight. He knew that the order was a blunder, and he said so; but he also knew that it was an order which, under that military code which speaks to the soldier like a voice from Sinai, left him no discretion. He obeyed. He led his six thousand into hopeless battle and held them under a leaden hail until twenty-two hundred lay on the ground about him. Then he thought he had lost all the men the order required him to lose, and he withdrew the remnant. This was the obedience and courage, on the 30th, of the man who on the 29th day of August was insubordinate and a coward. On August 31, knowing that such generalship must sink the Army of the Potomac, he determined to rescue his own reputation and that of his friends from the general wreck, and he sends, August 31, a rapid courier to Washington to demand of Abraham Lincoln an investigation that should prove his treason.

President Lincoln on the 5th of September granted his request and ordered a court of inquiry. Porter did not know his request was granted. He first heard it sixteen years afterward, when the original order appeared among the exhibits in his second trial. The War Department thought that this was not the court and this was not the time. Lee's victorious army was threatening Washington and they needed the most trustworthy soldier in the Army to guard the defenses of the capital. To that post of supreme importance they promptly summoned Porter, and the man who on the 29th day of August was a coward and a traitor on the 3d day of September at Arlington guarded this beleaguered city. Afterward they asked him to pick out his own division and his own commander to take them with his own old forces to Antietam.

When that campaign of disaster was ending, when Pope had been superseded by McClellan and Mr. McClellan by Burnside—when the people, mad in their disappointment, clamored for an explanation and a victim—then the Department gave them Porter. It organized its court. It summoned nine officers from the smoke of battle and placed them under the shadow of the Department to perform their task. They hesitated to do it. They lingered for weeks until a War Secretary ever ready to sacrifice an individual for the nation's life ordered them to find their verdict. The order was read in the morning, they found their verdict at noon, and in the afternoon they adjourned. Five could find a verdict. And the record tells us that one became a witness for the prosecution and four received promotion two weeks afterward. Porter met his fate as only a brave and innocent man could. He took himself and his family from the public eye. He has appeared only to recall or to present fresh evidence of his innocence. He worked and waited. He never threatened and he never murmured. He trusted in the justice of God and man. I think he has not trusted in vain.

At the time the verdict was given the evidence was printed and was read largely by the legal profession. With singular unanimity they condemned the result, and the great leaders of the profession, in writing and unsolicited, expressed their opinion that the evidence did not sustain the verdict. Those who gave such written opinions were lawyers like Daniel Lord, Charles O'Conor, Benjamin F. Curtis, and Sydney Bartlett. Afterward Legislatures in many Northern States, in New Jersey, in Pennsylvania, in New Hampshire, in Minnesota passed resolutions asking for a reopening of the case; and private citizens bearing such names as Edward Everett, Robert C. Winthrop, and Amos A. Lawrence, without consultation with Porter, prepared and signed memorials of similar purpose, which Porter with difficulty suppressed. Garfield himself introduced in this House a bill proposing a commission similar to that one which was afterward created, who should sit and review and report upon the new evidence. Public opinion in this demand grew irresistible, and in 1878 such a commission was created and acted. The conclusions of this commission, whose wording is so familiar to the country, reversed the findings of the first trial, and for a verdict of censure substituted a verdict of praise.

General Grant accepted their conclusions and boldly declared his conversion; and so did the Count of Paris, the impartial historian of our civil war, who in his second edition erased the charges he had made in his first. Since that time Senates have passed this bill, and one House of Representatives, by a vote in which more than a score of Republican members who had read the evidence were forced to join. These are the facts after the 29th day of August, 1862, and the presumptions to be drawn from them are not inconsistent with his innocence on that day.

Now let us look at what transpired on the 29th day of August, 1862, and our task is done. This is the one day in a long life—for Porter must be now more than sixty years old—when the man who was always faithful was, in a supreme moment, faithless; when the man always brave was a coward; when the man always a patriot was a traitor.

On this day Major-General Pope, in command of the Union forces in Virginia, was in active warfare on the field and in his dispatch box. He issued that afternoon an order to General Porter, dated at 4.30, commanding him to attack the enemy. General Porter did not attack the enemy. That is the charge; that is the crime if Porter committed one. And what is the defense? One is that the order was not delivered in time. This seems to be complete, but Porter has always refused to rest his case upon it. And I refer to it now only because it capitally illustrates two things which the committee should keep in mind. One is the strange carelessness with which the court in the first trial treated its evidence; and the other is the great value of the new testimony which was presented at the second trial.

The issue in the first trial was upon the time that the order was delivered. The prosecution introduced two witnesses, who were interested, whose words showed their views were conjectural. These two were the captain and his orderly, who brought the order. They testified that the order was delivered early and in good season. The defense introduced five witnesses of the highest character, disinterested, unimpeachable, who testified that it was delivered at dusk, late, too late for execution. The judges chose to believe two witnesses rather than the five led by Major General Sykes, and found that the order was delivered in time. With the same carelessness this court seems to have weighed its evidence all through the case. At the second trial, along with other new evidence, was produced (I think by General McDowell) a dispatch sent that day by Porter to General Pope. In this dispatch Porter showed his ignorance of Pope's whereabouts and his desire to get that information. Porter carelessly took the dispatch and was toying with it, when his eye read in the corner the hour when it was sent—"half-past six o'clock in the afternoon." At that hour evidently Pope's order had not come, and here was documentary evidence which confirmed the oral testimony of five witnesses and established this defense.

But upon this defense Porter refuses to rest his case. He disobeyed the order because it could not be executed, and because to attempt to execute it under the circumstances would be unsoldierly and cruel. Pope commanded him to attack the army of Jackson on the flank or on the rear. Porter could not attack the army of Jackson on the front or on the rear, because the army of Jackson was not before him, but the army of Longstreet, which had suddenly and unexpectedly appeared and assumed this position. Porter had ten thousand men, Longstreet twenty-five thousand men, and Porter could reach the flank or rear of Jackson only by first marching over the forces of Longstreet.

This thing, impossible to be done, he would have attempted had Pope been aware of the presence of Longstreet or present to accept the responsibility of the movement. But Pope was ignorant of the presence of Longstreet—the order itself showed it—and he had only assumed the responsibility of an attack upon Jackson. This left the responsibility of decision under these new circumstances upon Porter, and he decided wisely not to make the attack. So plain was it that the presence of Longstreet excused and forbade the attack, that in order to condemn Porter the first court had to find that Longstreet was not there. Abundant testimony has since proved that he was. So says Lee, the commander-in-chief of the confederate forces; so says Longstreet; so, finally, in a late magazine, says Pope, the persistent prosecutor, himself. And this ends the contest.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I ask you could any case be better buttressed by facts and authority than Fitz-John Porter's to-day? In his two trials Pope claimed that Longstreet was not there, and so admitted his own ignorance of the circumstances of the field; then came Longstreet to say he was there, and the circumstances of the field were just as Porter claimed. And these two admissions bring the case directly within the Napoleonic maxim, which declares "that discretion must be assumed by the subordinate when the superior who issued the order is absent and is ignorant of the circumstances in the case." And how well this discretion was exercised by the subordinate is proven by the best of evidence, the statement of Lee, who commanded the enemy's forces: "Porter could not flank Jackson. I suppose we would have cut Porter to pieces had he attempted to get at Jackson's flank."

In view of such facts how insignificant seems to be the hasty and imperfect decision at the first trial! So imperfect, that the whole legal profession rose with Bartlett, O'Conor, and Lord to say that there was not evidence to support it. Especially how insignificant does it appear by the side of the decision in the second trial, where judges of highest rank, upon mature deliberation and full evidence, after admitted prejudice against the accused, declare him not alone free from guilt but worthy of commendation. How well is Porter justified in his persistent trust in the ultimate justice of God and man, and how proud must he feel—if the sorrows of so many years leave any place for pride—when he sees all the great generals of the civil war, with one notable and regrettable exception, joining with Terry and Schofield and Grant to acclaim his innocence and to lead him to their august companionship. This is the story of Fitz-John Porter. An old, a familiar, a wearisome one to us, to him it is the story of a blighted life. Let the friends of justice do to-day what they can to repair the wrong and so end forever, so far as this House is concerned, one of the strangest and saddest scenes in American history.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman from New Jersey yield to me a portion of the remainder of his time to make a request?

Mr. PHELPS. I have yielded the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. CURTIN, otherwise I should be very glad to oblige his colleague.

Mr. KELLEY. I would ask again a moment that I may renew my application to print a review of the testimony on the part of the Judge-Advocate-General, which was presented to President Lincoln as a part of my remarks on this case.

Mr. BRAGG. And I object.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I hope no objection will be made.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman, some one asked me for a minute—I think the gentleman from Ohio, General WARNER. I will yield him that time, and know he will occupy that minute well.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I desired a moment that I may give a brief explanation of the vote I expect to cast on this bill. I am one of those who do not believe that Fitz-John Porter did his whole duty at the battle of second Bull Run. But, on the other hand, I believe that if the court which found him guilty of the charges as laid could assemble again, and have the evidence which now is in possession of the country presented to it, it would be compelled to reverse the verdict it once gave. For that reason I shall cast my vote for the passage of the bill. [Great applause.]

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Chairman, we had before us a bill in the last Congress to restore Fitz-John Porter, and we have to-day a similar bill to do for him what I regarded then and regard now as a measure of justice to an American citizen. I know the man well, sir. He was the first military officer of this Government who came to me in the beginning of the war, and of all the men who did come—and there were many—he was the most faithful, vigilant, active, and intelligent. He was placed on the staff of General Patterson, who commanded the Pennsylvania forces down in the Valley of Virginia.

My colleague from Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, has stated that in a council of war at Winchester Fitz-John Porter opposed an advance on the enemy. He was then a captain of the United States Army—that was all; and my colleague has not read the report of General Patterson, who commanded that force; and has not read that President Lincoln said to Patterson, "You can wait for your vindication." And the old man did wait—he who had been in the war of 1812 and '13, who commanded an army in Mexico in the war with that country, and at an advanced age took part in the war which so agitated this great country and imperiled our Government. When that war was over that old Irish hero so vindicated himself that every man in America agreed that he was right.

I recommend to my colleague to read General Patterson's book, and he will find that he acted under obedience to orders from Washington.

My colleague from Philadelphia, my venerable colleague [Mr. KELLEY], in the speech he made yesterday, denounces Fitz-John Porter as a traitor. Traitor, Mr. Chairman, is a terrible word to an American citizen. It means much. We have had few traitors in this great Government of ours from the beginning of our national existence down to this day. They have been few, indeed. The inspiration of patriotism and devotion to this great Government forbid that men should be traitors; and if Fitz-Fohn Porter is a traitor I am one. [Applause.] And yet I gave my country the best years of my life. I knew him well, and his friends. And the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] denounced Fitz-John Porter in a speech so technical and trite in the discussion of evidence that it would have been creditable in a court of quarter-sessions for a man who had stolen a pair of trousers or a pair of boots, or had violated the liquor law. [Laughter and applause.]

And, Mr. Chairman, he said, in his peroration, that he summoned from high heaven Garfield and others who are dead; he canonized as saints all the persons interested in the court-martial and condemnation of Fitz-John Porter—and I notice that the gentleman dealt generally with the dead [laughter]—that they, before the high court of heaven, would sustain the verdict that Fitz-John Porter was a traitor to his country. I want to say to the gentleman, under God I hope that Grant will be there, and if he is there, then there will be conflicting testimony on that point. [Applause and laughter.] And if he is there, I trust he will be permitted to cross-examine Grant, and that high court of heaven may be resolved into a court of quarter sessions, and the gentleman can then display his ability, his wit, as a cross-examiner, his logic, and his facts. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, Horace Greeley, of New York, and the man who has the honor to speak to you now, first presented to the Government of the United States a review of the court-martial and the sentence of Fitz-John Porter. They are in their graves; and will you say that Horace Greeley and Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, were traitors? Who will say that? And if you say to me that I am a traitor, say it in the corridor and you will regret it. [Laughter and applause.] We presented that subject to the Government after a full and deliberate consideration. Our names are on record and I glory in the fact that my humble name is in such association. I repeat I glory in the fact, and that the appeal was to vindicate an American citizen. That is all.

I hold in my hand Scribner, containing an article written by General Pope; and I have listened to the discussion on this floor; and in vindication of General Pope I have heard nothing new. It is all here. He complains of Halleck. He complains that his counsel was not accepted by Lincoln, who is so eulogized on this floor, and in those eulogies I most heartily unite. He complains of the tardiness of the officers who came up to him, and especially of John F. Reynolds.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Than whom there was never a more faithful soldier.

Mr. CURTIN. Never. He was an ideal soldier, so grand and pure that no man can taint his memory here. We erect monuments to him in Pennsylvania. The men of his corps in 10-cent subscriptions made a fund for a bronze statue of him at Gettysburg. And the State of Pennsylvania has now appropriated money to put up a monument to his memory where he fell. And a liberal gentleman of Pennsylvania, Mr. Temple—God bless him—subscribed $25,000 to put a bronze equestrian statue of that pure soldier in the city of Philadelphia, which I had the honor to unveil. I can not but express my indignation at the imputation that John F. Reynolds ever disobeyed an order.

Here it all is in this article. I say to the gentleman from Michigan, it is all here. I do not know if he read it, but it is all in Pope's own article. He says he advised the President and the Secretary of War—and he deals with dead men. My friend, Fitz-John Porter, lives. I am no longer young, but I am glad I live to vindicate him.

My venerable colleague from Philadelphia [Mr. KELLEY] quoted Dessaix, as was also done in the discussion last Congress. He has not read the history recently. Massena was shut up in Genoa. Dessaix was ordered to relieve him. Napoleon found he needed the column of Dessaix, and Dessaix came back to Marengo under orders. His tragic death made him remarkable in history. He obeyed the order and did come back.

Disobedience of orders and acting without orders is a common occurrence in all great wars, and a man is unfit to command armies who fails at times to exercise his judgment and discretion. It is for that he is put in the field and clothed with authority. It occurred very often in the war of the rebellion; notably my kinsman, General Gregg, when Hancock was hard pressed at Ream's Station, went to the sound of his guns, dismounted his cavalry, and assisted in preventing what might have been one of the greatest disasters of the war. If he had lost his command, as he acted without orders, gentlemen on this floor might have applied their wisdom and knowledge of war to him, and have had him court-martialed and dismissed.

My friend from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] has shown to the House that the order of which they complain arrived at 6.30. That is the end of it. The speech of the gentleman is so clear and forcible and his conclusions so just and logical, that it is unnecessary for any advocate of this bill to go over the same ground again. One more day and Fitz-John Porter, as these gentlemen know, with his column resisted the approach on Washington with eight thousand men, not ten thousand or twelve thousand, as you say; and it is part of the history of that battle that three thousand men of that column were either killed or wounded in that terrible struggle.

Mr. Chairman, I witnessed that war with intense anxiety; and for the State of Pennsylvania I feel pride in all the great people of that State did to preserve the Government. I will astonish you, sir, and this House when I tell you that after the second battle of Bull Run the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania put thirty-two regiments in the field in sixteen days. I ought, therefore, to know something about the war.

I wish to God it had never occurred. I believe if that war had not occurred and forced on me those terrible four years I would, thanks to my Irish ancestry, have lived to be a hundred. [Laughter.] If I had been ten years older it would have killed me. But I watched the war, I encouraged my fellow-citizens engaged in its hostilities and giving their lives as the highest measure of their fidelity to their country. I do hate to hear gentlemen on this floor denouncing American soldiers as traitors or cowards. Fitz-John Porter was not a coward. Ah, no! There were few cowards in that war on either side.

The newspapers were constantly clamoring "On to Richmond!" "On to Richmond!" but we always found some fellows between us and Richmond who gave us a great deal of trouble, as the soldiers who fought them will tell you. [Laughter.] The war should never have occurred, but it did; and I now appeal to this House, Mr. Chairman, to have justice done to an American soldier. Admiral Byng, who should have attacked the fort of St. Philip, at Minorca, but retired in the presence of a French superior force, was tried, convicted, and shot. But the ministry who made that victim were hooted and mobbed in the streets and turned out of power for the injustice done to that gallant man. History is constantly repeating itself.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this Government at that time needed a victim, and something had to be done. The disasters on the Peninsula had aroused the American people. McClellan was removed from the command, and Pope was recalled from the West to take command of the armies, and he proclaimed himself, in brilliant and glittering rhetoric, as commander of the armies. Although he says in his article he did not use the phrase, he announced that his headquarters would be in the saddle, which meant an improvised saddle down here at Willard's Hotel. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. He denies that.

Mr. CURTIN. His order was read by everybody at the time. I read it myself with great satisfaction. Now, I thought, we have got the right men, the fighting men, the men in the saddle. Now, if there has been anything elucidated on this floor in the discussion of this question, and in the newspapers and periodicals of the day, it is the utter impossibility of many of the conversations which are reported to have occurred with Abraham Lincoln, because, if they be true, when did he find time to attend to public duty?

When men are dead, that is the time to publish conversations [laughter]; for in these conversations men too often magnify themselves into consequence before the country. I used to see Lincoln myself occasionally, and when I did see him he attended promptly to the public business that we had under consideration and didn't talk much about anything else; but it would appear now from these publications that he devoted most of his time to holding conversations. [Laughter.] They are publishing conversations with him in all parts of the country, and conversations with Halleck and with Stanton. General Pope says in this article that he objected to the movement, did not desire the place of commander of the army, but accepted it and took the field. Sir, if there is anything in history that is beyond dispute, it is that that second battle of Bull Run was simply a struggle of a confused mob, one division going in after another without any concert, a front five miles long, and such a general state of confusion as would have resulted in the capture of Washington if the enemy had known the real situation.

Fortunately for the country they did not. Fortunately for us all they did not. Fortunately for you gentlemen who come here from the South to represent upon this floor, your people, who are now enjoying, in common with us all, the blessings and the benefits of this great Government; fortunately for you, they did not capture Washington. When that confusion was passed and McClellan was called back to the command of the Army, we obtained a success at South Mountain and a victory at Antietam.

As the House will remember, it was about that time that the conference of State governors was held at Altoona. The case for the conference was withheld until the Army of the Potomac obtained a success. The most active agents in the calling of that conference were Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, and Governor Morton, of Indiana. That conference was called to set a policy for the war and to urge its vigorous prosecution. The main question was whether the proclamation of freedom for the slaves should precede the Altoona conference or should follow it. There were seventeen governors of States present.

Before the conference it was decided that the proclamation of freedom should be issued, and that the war should be prosecuted vigorously, and that the governors would approve and support that policy, and they did. I do not deal with dead men or report conversations with dead men. [Laughter.] Of the seventeen governors there assembled there are three—Kirkwood, Blair, and Sprague—still living besides myself. Ask them, and they will tell you what we did there. We took that course because the war was about slavery, and the time had come to assert it. I hold in my hand the correspondence with Governor Andrew and with Governors Kirkwood and Blair, and I want it published soon, because I am afraid that the other three survivors of that conference may die. For my own part, I do not intend to die until it is done [laughter] and the history of that conference known to the nation, as it will be soon.

Now, as to Fitz-John Porter, I do not propose to go into the details of the case. I shall not undertake to say just when that famous order was received. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] says it came at half past 6, and he has no doubt investigated the facts. But, as I have said, I do not care to fight our battles over again. I do not like bloody-minded men. I never did. For a like reason I did not like the commissaries or the contractors who wanted the war to go on because they made money out of it, and when I visited the Army I always hated to see, as I did see stuck up on trees, notices announcing "embalming done at low prices." [Laughter.] As to these bloody-minded men, some of whom would wipe out everybody on this side of the House, these warriors who can never be appeased, they remind me of a noted character who lived in my town years ago. He was an old fellow; I think he had been a wagon-master in the Revolution; that was the tradition of the town. He used to tell a story of his warlike achievements in battle, and he told it so often that he believed it himself, and when strangers would come to the little village in which we lived they would give "Captain Curzy" (that was his name) a drink or two and get him to tell his story. The story, as he told it, was about like this: "At the battle of Monmouth," he would say, "although in the light-horse I fought that day on foot. I slashed with my saber cuts one and two, and a head went off here and a limb went off there, until the blood actually ran into my shoes. [Laughter.] A pile of dead bodies surrounded me; I was excited, and I was still slashing away, when I felt a touch on my shoulder. I looked up and there was Washington! [Laughter.] I shall never forget the solemnity of his appearance or the gravity of his speech. He gazed at me a moment without speaking, and then he said, 'Young man, restrain your impetuosity! In the name of God, do not make a slaughter-house of the field of battle!'" [Renewed laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to remind these bloody-minded men, if any of them are here, that the war has been over more than twenty years. The war ended nearly a quarter of a century ago. Good God, let us forget it! You gentlemen of the South are back in this house built by your fathers; we of the North are in the same house, built by our fathers. It was the soldiers of the Union that maintained this Government that made us one again, that restored peace and concord and fraternity. Mr. Chairman, there is a wide difference between a state and a government. For example, Sweden is a state; Belgium is a state. Can Austria be a state? Austria is a government. She holds Hungary, another nation, under subjection to her government.

But a state must be homogeneous. We are a state, if when the interests of Maine are touched the vibration is felt in California; if when the interests of the people of Oregon are violated it is felt in Florida. To be a great nation of sixty million people we must be homogeneous; we must be fraternal; and above all when an American citizen is punished unjustly we must relieve him and do justice. In a former age when a man said, "I am a Roman citizen," an empire moved to revenge his ignominious death, and the nation that touched the body of a Roman citizen was destroyed. When some years since the missionaries of the Cross in Africa were maltreated the Lion growled, and Great Britain knocked an empire to pieces and vindicated the rights of those who had suffered wrong.

We, as a nation, have been constantly making apologies; but in my judgment the time has come when this great people should assert themselves in the family of nations, when the mariner or the merchant or the man traveling for pleasure should be protected in any part of the world by the power of this great Government. Most of all, we should protect the honor and interests of the individual citizen of the United States. A man who is placed in the dock of the court of quarter sessions, accused of crime, epitomizes in himself all that there is in this Government. He is not to be convicted of crime without evidence. All the panoply of the Government, all its greatness and power, encircle the meanest citizen. Whether the man whose rights are in question be a "tramp" or a man of wealth it matters not; power must be exercised legitimately. If we fail to accord justice at home, how can we exact it abroad?

Gentlemen say there is no constitutional right on our part to review the finding of this court-martial. Sir, I am tired of that kind of talk. What does it mean? Does it mean that the action of a court-martial summoned suddenly to provide a victim for the indiscretion of the Government can not be reviewed? It has been reviewed, and honorable men have declared their judgment in opposition to the verdict of that court. I have on my desk a private letter from General Schofield to a friend of his, in which he says that he went to the trial of this case before the military court of inquiry without prejudice or feeling, and was convinced that Fitz-John Porter had been unjustly accused. Other gentlemen who sat on that board have come to the same conclusion.

But the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] complains that Grant was mistaken; half his speech was occupied with an effort to convince this House that Grant was mistaken, if not worse. Now, if there has been, in the history of this great nation, a military man deserving the respect and honor and gratitude of the country it is Grant. I am sorry he was ever President; I still more regret that he ever went to New York to be involved in the speculations of Wall street. For, mark it well, Grant during the whole war never took a place that he did not hold. That is his history. At Shiloh he went under the banks of the river, but he held the position. In the Wildnerness, when defeated, he did not know it; he held the position. Wherever he went, whatever position he took, he held. He developed from obscure life into one of the greatest soldiers of the world.

When the last court was appointed, Grant turned his attention with renewed interest to the case. One gentleman complains that Fitz-John Porter importuned Grant. Thank God, he did. He importuned different Presidents in succession. He knocked at the doors of this Hall. He demanded for himself and his children the justice due to an American citizen. If he importuned Grant he had the right to do so; and Grant yielded. Having made an investigation of the whole case, Grant declared to the American people that he had been mistaken.

Mr. BURLEIGH. And he never took that out of the record.

Mr. CURTIN. No; he never took it out. Why, sir, death came to Grant when he knew it was coming. The grim monster was feeling for his heart-strings day by day and hour by hour. So long as he could speak his voice was for his country, its perpetuity, its peace, its grandeur. When he could no longer speak, his writing was all in the same strain. Why, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, there is not in all history a death so poetically sublime as Grant's. And he will be there to answer the accusations which the gentleman said will be sustained above. Look out for Grant! I hope my friend from Michigan will get there; but look out for Grant, because on earth or in heaven that man will be believed.

Mr. Chairman, is my time out?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fifteen minutes more.

Mr. CURTIN. Why, I thought I had only fifteen minutes altogether. Well, I do not think I need say anything more on this question. I will not fight the battle of Bull Run over again. It has been fought so often on this floor and by some men who were not there [laughter], and I was not there! My enlightened friend from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] was there, and has made a speech on behalf of Fitz-John Porter; and Mr. Ray, of New York, who was also there, but not now a member of this House, made a speech on the same side in the last Congress.

A MEMBER. And Mr. HAYNES spoke on the same side.

Mr. CURTIN. Yes, I heard his speech and admired it. I heard also the speech of my excellent friend, the gallant gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], who was not there, and who elucidated this question on the map. Why, sir, what are maps worth? Anybody can make a map. While my excellent friend from Indiana made a map, I would remind him that Grant made maps also.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield at this point for a question?

Mr. CURTIN. Oh, yes; I am a yielding man.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania thinks that General Grant is to be believed either on earth or in heaven. Now, I desire to know whether he thinks that General Grant is to be believed when in his letter of May 9, 1874, to General Pope he wrote:

* * * I read during the trial the evidence and the final findings of the court, looking upon the whole trial as one of great importance, and particularly so to the Army and Navy. When General Porter's subsequent defense was published I received a copy of it and read it with care and attention, determined if he had been wronged and I could right him I would do so. My conclusion was that no new facts were developed that could be fairly considered, and that it was of doubtful legality whether by mere authority of the Executive a rehearing could be given.

Yours, truly,

U. S. GRANT.

General JOHN POPE,
United States Army.

Is Grant to be believed when he says there that he had read all the evidence and saw no new facts?

Mr. CURTIN. Oh, yes; as to facts the evidence of which was then before him, he was familiar with them. As to the question of legality, why, sir, this is the grandest inquest of the American people. This is the great tribunal for final adjudication of such questions. Do you say there is no appeal, no redress for the wrongs of an American citizen who has suffered as Porter has suffered? Why, sir; if a man is unjustly put into jail the governor or the President can pardon him.

Grant, after the date of the letters which the gentleman has just read, examined this whole case carefully at his home when death was almost upon him, and Grant then said that he had been mistaken. What manhood! How some other men are dwarfed beside him!

Mr. CUTCHEON. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself can have no controversy as to General Grant.

Mr. CURTIN. No.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Either as to his military supremacy or his absolute honesty. I wish now—— [Cries of "Go on, governor," from the Democratic side.]

Mr. CURTIN. I understand you perfectly. You said that; you read it before. I read it in your speech.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman has yielded to me.

Mr. CURTIN. But not too much.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman has invoked the names of Henry Wilson and of Horace Greeley and of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania himself.

Mr. CURTIN. Oh, never mind me.

Mr. CUTCHEON. As proving what? [Cries of "Go on, governor," from the Democratic side.] I have in my hands the letter of Henry Wilson, and also the letter of Horace Greeley, and also the letter of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CURTIN. Yes; we asked re-examination.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to what Henry Wilson did say.

Mr. CURTIN. I know what he said. You need not read it to me. I know it by heart. [Laughter and applause.] I know it better than the shorter catechism. [Renewed laughter and applause.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the honorable gentleman permit me to read it?

Mr. CURTIN. The gentleman from Michigan is a more adroit man than I am. I am a plain, common-sense man, and he is a very astute man. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman cited Henry Wilson.

Mr. CURTIN. I cited him. Henry Wilson believed him innocent; and so did Horace Greeley; and so did I, too. You shook me a little in your speech, but not much. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. Allow me to read it?

Mr. CURTIN. Oh, no; it is all in your speech. [Laughter.] There is not a man in your presence——

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would be glad to read it, and also to read the letter of Horace Greeley.

Mr. CURTIN. There is not a man in your presence to-day who can not read. If there is in this House such a one let him stand up and say so. There is not a man up. [Great laughter and applause.] I remember very well in the last Congress——

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman will not permit me to read what Mr. Wilson wrote.

Mr. CURTIN. No; they have all read it, and if they have not—as they can all read—they can go and read it for themselves. The gentleman in the last Congress stated on this floor that some kind of an arrangement had been made with Grant; that we ought to put him through again as a general, and that we would sustain him. Very well. The next morning it was not in his speech. I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan—I need not call him my friend; I would be friends with him if I could—but what he said about that arrangement was not in his speech as it was published the next morning. About two or three thousand years ago there were two men, one of whom repented and the other was severely shaken, just on the margin, at the eleventh hour, very near the fire. [Laughter and applause.] But though they were malefactors they did not bear false testimony against their neighbor, which false testimony has always been cursed. [Applause.]

Now that is all. The gentleman does not say that now. If these men are to be believed, we only ask for justice to a man who was injured.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Under these circumstances will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CURTIN. What do you want me to yield for? We should never agree. You have had your speech, and it was a good one. I did not interrupt you. If that is not enough to satisfy the gentleman I will tell him that it was one of the best speeches I ever heard. He made the most of it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman if he does not wish to yield to me.

Mr. LAIRD. I do not think it is fair to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be constantly interrupted.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can take care of himself.

Mr. CURTIN. I am about done. I desire to do justice to Fitz-John Porter. The gentleman himself says we are going to pass the bill. Oh, yes; we will pass it! [Applause.]

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for one minute?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. STEELE. Oh, let me alone.

Mr. CURTIN. One at a time. [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] has the floor. I have talked my time out; but what does the gentleman from Indiana wish to ask me.

Mr. STEELE. It is but a word.

Mr. BURROWS. I claim the balance of my time which I reserved.

Mr. BRAGG. There is no time left for anybody to claim.

Mr. CURTIN. Before I resume my seat I wish to say in reference to my friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], and I am pleased to call him my friend, that in nothing which I have uttered do I wish in the slightest degree to reflect upon his gallantry as a soldier. He was upon other fields and fought gallantly. I wish to treat him with the greatest possible respect. So, too, I wish to speak of the gentleman from Michigan. We differ on these points, and we only differ to that extent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having at all times, with a sincere belief in the innocency of Fitz-John Porter, whenever and wherever in my power advocating that justice should be done him, I make the last appeal for this gallant soldier, who, together with his family, have so long and so grievously suffered, to this august tribunal, representing the grand inquest of the American people.

I do this with great satisfaction, independent of your favorable official action, which is, I hope, to occur to-day, but from the higher and holier motives that I believe him innocent, and that I am thereby discharging a grateful duty to a gentleman who honors me with his friendship.

I am done. I yield the floor. [Applause.]

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BRAGG. I have the floor, Mr. Chairman, I believe.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to occupy my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that by a general order the time fixed for closing this debate expires at 3 o'clock to-day, when it is understood the previous question is to be ordered. The Chair has endeavored to divide the time equally between gentlemen favoring and those opposing the bill. In that effort to equally divide the time the Chair finds that the seven minutes between now and 3 o'clock belong to those who support the bill, and therefore the Chair recognized the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KELLEY. Then I would ask the Chair, with permission, whether an arrangement was not entered into between the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] and the House, the Speaker being in the chair at the time, that the previous question should be ordered at 3 o'clock and that the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill should have one hour thereafter? I ask whether that arrangement is not on record, and how, that being the order of the House, time can now be taken from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] and yield it to the gentleman who is ordered to confine himself to the hour after the previous question is ordered?

Mr. BRAGG. I will answer that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. I want the Chair to answer it. I addressed my inquiry to the chairman and not to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BRAGG. There is no order confining me to the hour, and no one knows that better than the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself.

Mr. BURROWS. Do I understand the Chair to deny the floor to me for the balance of the time, five minutes, remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, in response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the Chair can not take cognizance of the ruling of the Speaker; but if the gentleman desires it the Chair will cause to be read the agreement or understanding entered into at that time.

Mr. BURROWS. That will consume the balance of the time, and if I am entitled to the floor I desire to proceed now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the remaining time belongs to those gentlemen who support the bill, which will equalize the time.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen upon the other side have had their time. Now let me be heard.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask unanimous consent of the House, in the few minutes remaining of the gentleman from Pennsylvania's time, to print in the RECORD the letter of Henry Wilson, Horace Greeley, and ANDREW G. CURTIN.

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

Mr. CURTIN. Except as to my letter. Print my letter. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

Mr. CURTIN. I promised my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. EVERHART] five minutes, which promise I had entirely forgotten. I hope that it will be allowed to him, although he is against the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. REED, of Maine. What was the ruling of the Speaker that the chairman was about to have read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania desired, the understanding which was reached in the House with reference to the debate on the bill would be read.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, I am not surprised that a member of the old Fifth Army Corps should be able to cause such disturbance in the ranks of the enemy. I stand here to-day, sir, representing the old Fifth Army Corps, and a member also of the First Army Corps, wearing upon my breast the badge of the old Army of the Potomac that loved McClellan and Porter while they fought the battles of this country well, despite Congressional influence. [Applause.] They sometimes had good officers; they sometimes had officers of medium capacity, and they sometimes had officers that would have disgraced a country militia camp. But, sir, they fought steady and well against the flower of the confederate army, led by their ablest captains. Their danger was more from the rear than from the front, for Congressional committees were prowling through their camps looking for candidates for the Presidency, and interfering with all orders that their general officers issued. [Applause.] That condition of things existed up until the time that the country cried out against it and the power was given to General Grant to command all the armies. Then, with him at their head, the Army of the Potomac went forward to victory and closed the war and saved the Union by the surrender at Appomattox. So have we, friends of Fitz-John Porter, pressed forward year after year asking that justice be done to him. Partisan zeal and malicious personal motives combined with it have prevented a fair and impartial hearing, and have made men fearful to vote in accordance with their judgment lest the long black mark should go down across their name and the curse of the G. O. P. be issued against them.

But at last, like the Army of the Potomac in its campaigns, we come on this battlefield with the great captain, Grant, at our head, and we are going to win the battle. Justice is all that we ask. Mr. Chairman, there is no better test in the world of the honesty, the faithfulness, the zeal, the ardor, and the bravery of an officer than the testimony of the men under his command.

Mr. BURROWS. Has not the time arrived when the previous question was to be called?

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of 3 o'clock has arrived.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had, according to special order, under consideration the bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, had instructed him to report the same back to the House without amendment.

Mr. BRAGG. I move the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish to ask if amendments are now in order or will be at any time?

The SPEAKER. If the demand for the previous question is not sustained amendments will be in order. If the previous question is ordered, then all amendments, under the rule, will be cut off.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to ask another question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EVERHART] gave notice of an amendment which he proposed to send up. Will that amendment be considered as pending?

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee of the Whole House reports the bill back to the House without amendment.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire to offer an amendment to the last clause of the bill if it can be permitted. Possibly the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit me to do so. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to move an amendment to the last clause of the bill.

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir; I yield for nothing.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BRAGG. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions to add as the second section of the bill what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Andrew J. Smith, late a major-general of the United States volunteers and colonel of the Seventh Cavalry of the United States, never was court-martialed;

Whereas said Andrew J. Smith was never accused of disobedience of the orders of his superior officers and never turned his back upon the enemy, always marched when ordered without question as to the difficulties or dangers in the way;

Whereas said Andrew J. Smith never had his loyalty to his country or his commanding officer questioned during a continuance in service from July 1, 1838, to May 6, 1869, through all grades from second lieutenant of the First Dragoons to major-general of volunteers;

Whereas the said Andrew J. Smith received the brevet of colonel, United States Army, April 10, 1864, for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Pleasant Hill, La.; of brigadier-general, United States Army, March 13, 1865, "for gallant and meritorious service at the battle of Tupelo, Miss.," and of major-general, United States Army, March 13, 1865, "for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Nashville, Tenn.;" and

Whereas the said Andrew J. Smith performed longer and more arduous and gallant services on our frontier before the late war of the Rebellion than any other living man. This old veteran, now full of years—three-score and ten—being poor, is entitled to the grateful recognition of his country.

That the laws regulating appointments in the Army be, and they are hereby, suspended, and suspended only for the purposes of this act; and the President is hereby authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Andrew J. Smith, late colonel of the Seventh United States Cavalry and a major-general of volunteers, a brigadier-general in the Army of the United States, and thereupon to place him, the said Andrew J. Smith, upon the retired-list of the Army as such brigadier-general, without regard and in addition to the number now authorized by law of said retired-list.

Mr. BRAGG. I make the point of order on that proposition that it is not germane to the subject-matter of the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] makes the point of order that this proposes to instruct the committee to amend the bill by adding to it a subject not germane.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I wish to be heard on the point of order. Notwithstanding the fact that this bill for the rehabilitation of Fitz-John Porter has a preamble which relates entirely to him, nevertheless, if it is a proper bill to be presented for the consideration of this House, it must be because it creates an office such as is needed for the carrying on of the business of the United States. And if the bill proposes to create one office, or rather one officer, it certainly must be in order to propose to double that number.

If the Chair shall decide that the purpose of this bill is not to create an office which is needed to carry on the business of the United States Government, it certainly exposes the character of this bill as to its constitutionality and purpose more thoroughly than any lengthy argument can do. The pretense here is the creation of an office. I do not say anything about the propriety, which seems to me indefensible, of proposing to the Executive that it shall create that office and put a man in it whom Congress has designated or he shall not have the office at all. But if it be proper for this House by a bill to propose that there be one officer of a certain class it must be within the competency of this House to decide that there may be two of a class, or twenty, or a hundred; and if it be proper to do as is done in the first bill—if it be proper to fill that office by legislative act, it must be equally competent to fill a second position created in like manner by act of Congress.

I do not know but that the point of order will be sustained, but I think that the situation is very well explained by it.

The SPEAKER. The bill under consideration is a private bill, the title of which is, "An act for the relief of Fitz-John Porter." So far as the Chair knows, it has always been held in the House that a bill for the benefit of one private individual could not be amended so as to extend its provisions to another by an amendment offered upon the floor, and the present occupant of the chair has had occasion to decide very frequently that it is not competent to do indirectly, by recommitting a bill with instructions, that which could not be done directly by an amendment offered by a member. The Chair thinks that the point of order is well taken, and that the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] is not in order.

Mr. EVERHART. Mr. Speaker, if the previous motion is withdrawn, I move to recommit the bill with instructions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that the previous motion was not in order.

Mr. EVERHART. Then I move to recommit the bill with instructions to strike out the last line.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the words which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EVERHART] moves to strike out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out at the end of the bill the words "prior to his appointment under this act;" so that the proviso will read:

"Provided, That said Fitz-John Porter shall receive no pay, compensation, or allowance whatever."

The House divided on the motion of Mr. EVERHART; and there were ayes 103.

Before the noes were announced,

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered. The question was taken; and there were—yeas 112, nays 175, not voting 36; as follows:

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The Clerk proceeded to read the names of members voting.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with the reading of the names.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, permit me to ask if the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] is recorded as having voted?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] voted on the second call.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. That gentleman and myself were paired on all preliminary questions in connection with the Fitz-John Porter case. I was present in my seat listening to the roll-call, and on the first call the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] did not respond. Believing that it were better that I should treat this as a preliminary question, I also failed to respond. I think that now it is but fair that I should be permitted to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the name of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] should be called.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, and he voted ay.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. TURNER] is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. REESE] is absent on account of the death of his father.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. BARBOUR with Mr. PIRCE, until further notice.

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. GROSVENOR, until further notice.

Mr. LANDES with Mr. PAYNE.

Mr. BOYLE with Mr. WAIT. If present, Mr. BOYLE would vote for the Fitz-John Porter bill.

Mr. COLE with Mr. PLUMB, on political questions, until Friday next. On the Fitz-John Porter bill, Mr. COLE, if present, would vote for the bill and Mr. PLUMB against it.

Mr. MCADOO with Mr. GOFF, on all political questions, until further notice. If present, Mr. MCADOO would vote for the Fitz-John Porter bill, Mr. GOFF against it.

Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. PETTIBONE, for this day.

Mr. RANDALL with Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, for this day.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, with Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, on this vote.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I was paired with Mr. TOWNSHEND on all political questions, but I was not paired with him upon the passage of the Fitz-John Porter bill. However, it apparently having been the understanding that I was so paired, if my vote would change the result upon the passage of the bill I would not vote; but as it probably will not, I wish to have my vote recorded.

Mr. PIRCE. Mr. Speaker, my name was called, and I voted. I have since learned that I was paired. I did not know it; but if I am paired I desire to withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. The pair of the gentleman with another member has been announced.

Mr. STAHLNECKER. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent during the roll-call. Had I been present, I would have voted against recommitting this bill.

The result of the yea-and-nay vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw the motion which I made for the previous question upon the passage of the bill. I will renew it at the conclusion of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] withdraws his motion for the previous question.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, does that require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. No; there has been no decision on it.

Mr. BRAGG. It requires my unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker, it is a serious question to ask one to discuss seriatim the numerous points of this case within the limited space of one hour. I can not do it; I shall not attempt to do it. I have given months of study to the consideration of this case——

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether the previous question has not already been ordered, and whether the gentleman can now withdraw the call.

The SPEAKER. The previous question was ordered on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time. The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. STEELE. Has not the previous question been ordered on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It has not. The gentleman from Wisconsin demanded it, but before the question was put a motion was made to recommit the bill with instructions. The gentleman from Wisconsin now withdraws the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, independent of being personally upon that field and of marching behind the color of Fitz-John Porter on the 29th of August, 1862, and of fighting steadily to the front, following that same color against the enemy on the 30th of August—independent of personal knowledge—independent of the fact that I read day by day the testimony produced before the original court-martial as the proceedings went on—I have since that time given two months to a careful compilation of the evidence before the old court; have compared it with the evidence before the new court, and line by line have abstracted and analyzed it, so that I have a slight conception that I know what is contained in the record. And I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to gentlemen of the House, that no greater disgrace has ever stained the pages of the history of a republic or of a despotic form of government than the finding and sentence against Fitz-John Porter that was made in accord with the demands of the Secretary of War in 1863. There was scarcely a principle of law or of evidence that was not violated; and every lawyer in this country who has examined the question judicially has so said, and will so say down all time.

That court sat, sir, in the midst of an excitement the like of which this country never before saw and I trust in God may never see again. Disaster attended our arms. A black pall was cast over all our people. The capital was in danger. Men were struggling for political preferment in this Hall, in the streets, in the hotels, and in all the entrances of the public offices of this country. Each man was striving to outdo his neighbor in bending the pliant knee to power so that he could get place. Under such circumstances this court was convened—not by the order of the President, but by the clerk of the Secretary of War.

Sir, there has been much said about this court. I am a man who deals in plain talk. I have no cant and no hypocrisy in my composition; and I must say that it fills me with supreme disgust, when there is an argument as to whether the truth be on one side or the other, to see the Republican party running (as I have seen boys run away from their mothers), and just as they are about to receive a blow cry out, "Oh, you are going to hurt Mr. Lincoln!" There is where the sneaks of your party always run. You dare not face the truth and decide upon it as men, but you run behind Mr. Lincoln; you run behind the court; you run behind the Secretary of War. Why is it that you do this? Because you are afraid that an investigation will rustle some drapery that enshrouds your self-canonized saints, and when the drapery is pulled aside, as with the saints of old whose history we now read, you will find heaps of moral corruption underneath that drapery.

Now, let us talk a little about the court and see whether it was not a court exactly adapted to the circumstances of the case by the master-hand that sought to bring about a result. Who was its president? You say the great General Hunter. What position did he occupy? He had been removed from his command in South Carolina because of incompetency. Removed by whom? By the man that put him as president of that court, to do justice. Justice? No; to do Stanton's bidding. Who were the other members of the court? One of them a man who, as the report of General Pope himself shows, disobeyed orders and when he held the key to the door between Longstreet and Jackson deserted the field and retired (after being ordered to hold on) without firing a shot; and for that reason he had been relieved from his command. Was he not an elegant man under the direction of Mr. Stanton to do justice? Who was another man? A man who had fallen into disrepute in Colorado and had found himself over here as military governor in Alexandria, and Colonel Morris was stricken off the court in order to make a place for him—to make a sure thing. Then came Buford, from Kentucky—not General Buford, the soldier—no, no! Then came General Prentiss, whose division was surprised at Shiloh. They are all worthy men, to be sure; but they all occupied exactly the position that Mr. Stanton wanted the men to occupy that were to decide upon sacrificing the life or character of the man against whom he aimed his blow.

Why, sir, I was told the other day that there had been no promotions of members of that court, and I was challenged to tell who were promoted, and that, too, by a gentleman who claims to have spent months in examining this case and its surroundings. Buford was promoted within a very few days after the rendition of that verdict. Casey was promoted within a few days after the rendition of that verdict, and he, too, was under a cloud for a report as to allowing his division to break at Seven Pines.

Mr. STEELE. General Hunter——

Mr. BRAGG. Be quiet. When that verdict was rendered General Hunter was restored to his command. There is his pay. [Applause.] When that verdict was rendered General King, the man who disobeyed the order and ran away from between Jackson and Longstreet on the 29th of August, was restored to his command. Smith, the swift witness, who I am sorry to say once lived in my county, was made, at the age of nearly sixty, a paymaster in the Army for his testimony. Douglas Pope, who swore that he carried that dispatch in half an hour, when the next messenger who went, knowing the place, took six hours to deliver the dispatch, was made a captain in the regular Army. Rewards and punishments followed one another very rapidly in those days.

That is the court. Those are the gentlemen whose memories you are afraid to disturb. What did they find? I might go further. That court was placed in charge of an apostate Democrat [laughter] to do the bidding of another apostate Democrat who was acting as Secretary of War. The two apostates, as apostates always do, out-Heroded Herod in order to get at the top of the column of the new company into which they were brought. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. NEGLEY. As the gentleman has defined the character of an apostate Democrat, will he define the character of an apostate Republican?

Mr. BRAGG. I do not yield to the gentleman. I will give you the character of an apostate Democrat. He is a man who cut the Democracy and went into the Republican party for an office; he then became a Republican saint, but I call him an apostate Democrat. [Applause.]

Let us go back to contemporaneous events and let me present to you some of the evidence in detail and give you some of the minor decisions upon these questions as they went along by the men who were acting in connection with them.

My distinguished and eloquent friend from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] this morning painted the situation beautifully, both before and after the battle, but there were some things which he did not describe, because he did not know them.

The first order that Fitz-John Porter received from John Pope was to move to Warrenton Junction for the purpose of moving next morning on Greenwich. Porter arrived in his camp at night—just at nightfall. General Porter, Fitz-John Porter, the coward, the laggard, the man who was seeking an opportunity to do what he did—what did he do? He dispatched two aids, Monteith and McQuaid, to ride over that country between daylight and dark so far as they could go, to ascertain the condition of all the roads, so he might move his command in fighting order on Greenwich.

There is the man whom they say did not want to move with alacrity to meet the orders of John Pope. Soldier as he was, he comes for the first time into that part of Virginia with a body of troops, without acquaintance with the country, with no knowledge of the roads and surroundings, with no knowledge of the plan of the campaign, because there was not any plan. [Laughter and applause]. There he was, with a corps that loved him as children love their father and he loved them. They were proud of him and he was proud of them. Without suggestion from anybody he dispatched his staff officers at once for the purpose of inquiring into the condition of the country—the condition of the roads, so that he could handle his troops. And for what? Not to fight for John Pope. No, sir. No good soldier ever fought for any man. He did it in order that he might fight the battles of his country and bring back victory to its flag out of the hands of incompetency. [Applause.]

It was that night, while these men were making their reconnaissances and coming in, that an order came for him to move. The order was to move at 1. His direction, after consulting with his officers, was to move at 3. Why? Because by moving at 3 he had his men in hand to use them for a fight, whereas if he moved at midnight in a broken country with streams and quicksand bottoms to be crossed with his artillery, with roads packed and crowded by Sigel's wagons and wagons coming in from every direction of the country, his men would come in, as every soldier knows, jaded and weary and unable to accomplish any purpose whatever.

Mr. STEELE. Is it not frequently the case——

Mr. BRAGG. You had your two hours and I have only an hour.

Mr. STEELE. We will give the gentleman all the time he wants.

Mr. BRAGG. What did he do? He sent a dispatch to John Pope informing him of the condition; that is what he did.

Mr. STEELE. There is no record of it.

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, there is; and there is the reason why I knew the other day you had never read the evidence. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. I should like to see the record.

Mr. WHEELER. Page 28 of the record.

Mr. BRAGG. John Pope so testified, that he received another note, and he thought one, too, explaining the circumstances. I knew you did not know it, but it is only a little thing. There he was. When he had determined, in order his commanding officer might know his position, he dispatched a staff officer with a note, and John Pope swears to it. Then, sir, when he reported himself the next morning, there you have John Pope's judgment on Fitz-John Porter's disobedience established by his reception of him, by his shaking him by the hand, by his discussing the plan of the campaign (if he had one), and without one single word of passion, without a single word of complaint, and putting him in command of what was recognized as the flower of the army. There, sir, is judgment number one in a court in which John Pope was sole presiding justice.

John Pope remained with that corps until it went in camp at Bristoe and was at Sykes's headquarters, where General Porter was. He left that command at Bristoe without orders to move; and now let me show you where this cowardly laggard Fitz-John Porter was and what he tried to do. At 5 o'clock that day Porter heard the firing of Gibbon's guns. He did not know that McDowell had run away. He did not know that Sigel was standing aloof. He did not know that General Gibbon's pet little "Iron Brigade" was being hurled against Jackson's forces, as many as they could bring, but he supposed there was some order, some method in the battle, and he sent a staff officer to Pope. What for? To get orders to go into the fight. Pope was looking through a field-glass at the flashes of the guns and sent word to him, "Tell General Porter when I want him I will send for him."

Mr. STEELE. Now let me ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir; I decline to yield.

Mr. STEELE. In all fairness I hope the gentleman will not refuse.

Mr. BRAGG. Not in my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. STEELE. I yielded every time you rose to interrupt me. [Loud cries of "Order!"]

Mr. BRAGG. It was said, Mr. Speaker, that that was a mere "conjuring" of a staff officer, who ought not to be believed; but, sir, when the board met at West Point the original letter, directed to John Pope, was produced from General Pope's miscellanies, that was sent by Fitz-John Porter asking for orders, and dated it 5 p. m. Pope the hero and McDowell the Ney of that campaign—one ran away from his command and the other sat upon his horse looking through his glass watching the flashes of the guns of Gibbon's brigade as we stemmed the tide of Jackson's host, and Porter, chafing for the fray, burning to make himself the bright shining star of the war and add still greater luster to the historic name of Porter, sent a dispatch for permission to go in the fight.

"When I want you I will send for you" was the reply he received from the general commanding!

That is the traitor up till the 29th day of August. What then?

Why, Porter actually ate his breakfast and dictated a dispatch in his own camp that morning. Why should he have been elsewhere? The order for Fitz-John Porter to move was given at Centreville at 3.30 a. m., and Centreville was 12 miles from Porter's camp. There you have the ride of your orderly for 12 miles before an order could be delivered. He had been given notice not to go forward until he got orders. You may make it half past 5 or 6 when the order was received. His men were to be breakfasted and break camp. Then he put his command in motion, as he always did, and down he came to Manassas Junction, and, with the head of his column toward Centreville, looked to find the itinerant commander-in-chief.

Mr. STEELE. That order was sent from the headquarters between Manassas and Centreville.

Mr. BRAGG. This order is dated 3.30 a. m. at Centerville.

Mr. STEELE. The headquarters were at Bull Run, half-way between Manassas Junction and Centreville.

Mr. BRAGG. That is another order altogether. That is the one you looked up. [Laughter and applause.]

But, sir, let me stop right here, for I have passed in the hurry of this argument a point where I have not done my friends on the other side justice. I desire to do it in order to show how the verdict of that court-martial was made to mold the public sentiment of this country. There was taken out of the testimony an analysis of all the evidence that bore against the defendant, and not one single word of testimony in his behalf was added to it, which was compiled, and printed at a Government press, and sent to every officer of the United States.

Mr. STEELE. Why do you object to allowing the gentleman from Pennsylvania to print that compilation to show what it was?

Mr. BRAGG. It was sent all over the country indorsed "The proceedings and evidence of the court that tried Fitz-John Porter;" and that was the record which General Grant read when he supposed he knew all about the case.

Mr. STEELE. Let the compilation be printed so as to show whether that statement is true or not.

Mr. BRAGG. Following that came another prepared paper, and that was prepared by General McDowell, and in that was the embodiment of the report of Jackson, containing his account of the resistance to the attack of the Fifth Corps on the 30th day of August, which was made to appear in the testimony, by a false indorsement across the top, against the defendant as if it applied to the action of the 29th of August. These are matters of history and they are in the record.

Now, to show you that the animus of the partisan Republican has not yet died out, let me state that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] took the report of the battle of Bull Run and read from the official records the number of killed and wounded upon the 29th day of August for the purpose of showing that there was a general battle. If he had been disposed to be ingenuous he would have said that the headings of those official reports are the casualties between the 16th day of August and the 2d of September.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I have so stated. The entire number of casualties is 14,462.

Mr. BRAGG. But that is not the statement you made in your argument. It is the same old story. You took a table of figures from a heading that covered almost a month, including all the battles of the Rappahannock and Cedar Mountain, and from that table you have stated in your speech the evidence of losses on the 29th of August. And your Republican constituents, who read nothing but your speech in a Republican newspaper, will think that is historical evidence of the war.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The figures show precisely what they apply to.

Mr. BRAGG. I decline to be disturbed.

Mr. CUTCHEON. When you make such a statement as that I should be allowed to make a correction.

Mr. BRAGG. I state what you said. I state what the figures are. I draw my own inferences as to your purposes, and will repeat them if you desire it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I only claim you shall not cram a falsehood down the throat of this House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Michigan that the gentleman from Wisconsin is not subject to interruption except by his consent, and he has declined to yield.

Mr. BRAGG. I am delighted I have driven one Radical from under Stanton's petticoats, so that he has come out to the front.

When Fitz-John Porter reached Manassas and was passing on he received notice from Pope that he should turn back. What did General Pope then do? General Pope then directed the traitor, the coward, the laggard, to take away from McDowell the best division in the First Army Corps and take command of it himself. There is another judgment of John Pope on the faithful conduct and fidelity of Fitz-John Porter. He detached from McDowell King's division, which in his report he said contained the flower of that corps, and gave it to Porter and left McDowell in disgrace. McDowell followed him until he got the joint order, and when he got it he rode on to Porter.

In what condition was Porter then? Why, Mr. Chairman, when McDowell reached Porter, Porter's line of battle was on Dawkin's Branch. His skirmishers were across Dawkin's Branch; Butterfield, in command of one of his favorite brigades, was moving at the head of his column beyond the branch intending to form a line of battle for others to move up to. He saw the enemy, as the Fifth Corps always did, and the sight neither frightened, sickened, nor confused him.

His place was with his men to the front and forward. But Butterfield, as he tells you, riding on, when he turned about, discovered his brigade was gone. What had become of the brigade? He rode back, he tells you, in a rage to think his command had been taken away from him, and then he learned General McDowell, the senior officer on the field, had ordered his troops to be withdrawn. And upon the testimony of that witness this court found Fitz-John Porter guilty of not moving to the front, when his guilt consists in obeying the military direction of his superior officer.

Mr. STEELE. There is no evidence that General McDowell gave any such order.

Mr. BRAGG. I will tell you where to look for it. Read the evidence of a Michigan captain, who tells you he heard McDowell tell him so.

Mr. STEELE. But he swears he did not.

Mr. BRAGG. He swears like the Italian witness on the trial of Queen Caroline; whenever he gets in a corner, he says, "Non mi ricordo."

There was the testimony of Morell's staff and the testimony of Porter's staff, that that advance—which my friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES] thought might have amounted to a success—was actually being made. The struggle was going on, with the Fifth Corps and its commander unflinching, until this marplot came, not to fight a battle, but to call out that he might get hurt if he went that way. That was the first thing McDowell always thought of, that he might get hurt. He thought he would go by virtue of his authority on that field, take King's division away, saying, "You remain here while I go and put them in there."

Mr. CUTCHEON. But does not the evidence show——

Mr. BRAGG. I do not yield. The galled jade winces, but I can not wait to hear her cry. That is the fact; for I marched in King's division on that bloody day. I followed down the way McDowell said he was going, and he never joined his division that day or the next.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me to read——

Mr. BRAGG. No, sir. I do not allow you to read anything. If I had two hours' time I would give you all the chances you want, but I have not got it.

On my march to the Henry house I saw that distinguished major-general riding along with a staff officer, far away from his command, which was being pressed into that vigorous battle, and when we reached the Henry house we could not find him to report to and did not know where the balance of his division was, and neither did he. And yet, to show how evenly justice was meted out in those days, while Porter was being tried by court-martial, McDowell had a court of inquiry. That court of inquiry found that he was guilty of opening the gap between Longstreet and Jackson, so that the responsibility for the failure of the campaign rested upon him, but, like the country justice in the story, they said that in consideration of the strong recommendations of his friend John Pope they would excuse him! [Laughter.] That was their decision, and there comes in "the milk in the cocoanut."

Pope, McDowell, Benny Roberts, Paymaster Smith, Douglas Pope, were all moving on that court-martial. The conviction of McDowell would have destroyed the mainspring of the case. In order to clear McDowell, they allowed him to give evidence of his heroic conduct on the 30th, which was a myth. When Porter was on trial and his counsel asked the court to consider what his action was the day before and the day after the 29th, in order that his true animus might appear, My Lord Chief-Justice Holt said, "No! such a thing never was heard of." Yet in the adjoining court it was heard of, and a man was cleared there in order that he might come into the next room and give testimony against his comrade, his superior in every particular and in every high quality which makes a soldier with which God Almighty has ever endowed humanity. That is the justice that is talked about here. Perhaps you may think that King ran away.

Mr. STEELE. He belonged to your division. You should know more about that than we do.

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, King ran away and we had to follow him, but we did not follow him until John Gibbon, with four regiments, left upon the field seven hundred and seventy-seven men out of eighteen hundred, to test, not their loyalty to Pope—for he was an object of derision to every man in the command—but to show our devotion and loyalty to our Government and to teach the gentlemen on the other side who had so often boasted that one man of theirs could whip three of ours, that, whether that was so as a rule or not, the "black hats" of the West could not be driven by any men in any such proportion. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have given to the House different verdicts of Pope upon Porter. Let me now give one more verdict of Pope upon Porter. When we fell back in total rout at Centreville on Sunday morning after that battle, when neither Pope nor McDowell knew anything about the military organization, for Pope telegraphed to Halleck, as you will see in his official report, that he had not lost a gun nor a wagon, and Halleck at the other end of the line responded, "You have done gloriously, and the country is in arms to congratulate you and receive you on your victorious return from the second Bull Run" [laughter]—in that situation there was needed a military mind, a man who could inspire confidence in the troops. The situation required a man who, if two regiments were marching by different roads to a junction, could tell something about where the roads would join, and the Army had not had such a man in that campaign up to that time. In looking about for a man to take command of the mob in that exigency Fitz-John Porter was selected by General Pope and given the post of honor, the command of the rear-guard, to protect those military scalawags on their trip to Washington to enter complaint, as it proved, against him.

The only organized body of forces that amounted to anything like a division or corps was the old Fifth Corps, with all its banners tattered and torn, with its ranks thinned, but with its survivors still inspired with love for their commander and for their country. Just think of it, Brother STEELE, that Pope in that trying hour, when everything turned on alacrity and judgment, should have given control of his army to a coward, a laggard, and a traitor, a man in whom his countrymen put no trust! Oh, shame on you, men! The day will come when the history of the war shall be written long after us, when the grand old party that you are trying to keep from going to pieces shall be forgotten, except to be execrated, and when your sons will blush to think that you were Porter's foes. [Derisive laughter and cheers on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, there is one more judgment on Porter that I want to call attention to. Abraham Lincoln placed Fitz-John Porter in command of the defenses of Washington. What a traitor Lincoln was! He placed Porter in command of the defenses of the national capital. What did he do with Pope? What did he do with McDowell?

Mr. STEELE. Where was McClellan?

Mr. LAWLER. At the head of the Army.

Mr. BRAGG. Pope was sent to fight the Indians in Minnesota; McDowell was sent to the rear, and neither of them ever commanded a soldier again during the war.

Occupying that position, did not those two men occupy a position that should call on their utmost zeal and their most intense forgetfulness to bring about a verdict that should blacken somebody else's character? There is Mr. Lincoln's judgment upon the men—Porter in the defenses of Washington, Porter commanding the reserve and re-enforcing the lines of Antietam; Pope and McDowell, rejected as worthless vessels, were sent to the rear, to spend their time writing dispatches and articles addressed to the commissaries and sutlers of the Army. And there is where they belonged.

Still, it said we can not upset the verdict of a court-martial. Upon that subject I desire to speak my views distinctly and unmistakably. The power to control the Army rests absolutely in time of peace in the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, except where there is some prohibition of positive law; in time of war the maxim Inter arma silent leges prevails; and civil law does not affect or control him. So that all the power of the military establishment, except as regulated by law, rests in the President of the United States. Show me any provision of law that prevents the President, when he sees injustice being done to one of his officers, from sending a board of inquiry to examine into the facts; show me any law but one—and that was passed for the Porter case. But for that law the President could have restored Porter of his own free will.

But, sir, gentlemen tell me that in this Republic Congress, the source of the law-making power, having exclusive authority to make rules for the government of the Army, may not make a law affecting the judgment of a court-martial. Why, sir, has not Congress power to discharge the judgment even of a civil court? If not, why do men come here and ask to be relieved from the operations of judgments? Congress has no power to discharge a judgment between two private individuals, for that would interfere with a provision designed to protect the rights of persons under the Constitution, but when the judgment runs for the benefit of the United States we represent the United States; we are the attorneys in fact of the people, and we may cancel any judgment the United States have recovered. There is no power on earth to interfere with us; there is no law that can be cited to tie our hands.

One thing further. Cowardly shame seeks silence; conscious innocence is always bold. From the hour of the rendition of that verdict up to the present time Fitz-John Porter has persisted unalterably and firmly in declaring that he was innocent both in thought and deed. For years he did not come to Congress for relief. He went to the War Department, like a soldier. He filed his petition. When Congress had a two-thirds majority in both branches against men thinking like him, he kept his petition there. It was acted upon adversely by General Schofield, as Secretary of War. He continued to press it through the military channel until Rutherford B. Hayes, acting President of the United States [laughter and applause on the Democratic side], directed a board to be convened; and upon that board he placed the man who, when he was under political pressure as a Republican Secretary of War, had refused to act in the case. Upon that board he placed a volunteer officer who had pronounced his judgment that Porter ought to be shot. Upon that board he placed another regular Army officer whose convictions upon the testimony that he had seen were open and announced in favor of the declaration of Porter's guilt.

But, as I said, innocence is always bold. Porter went before that board. All he asked was a careful analysis of the evidence and an understanding of the situation. That board reversed the previous judgment and found in his favor. They found that instead of ever enveloping Jackson's flank, as represented in the old map, which was produced and sworn to before the previous court-martial, Porter's corps was more than 3 miles from there, and the ground where it had been supposed Porter was in a position from which he could have rolled up Jackson like a scroll was in fact occupied by Longstreet. And that judgment was transmitted by a Republican President to Congress for its action in the premises, and then for the first time Fitz-John Porter came to Congress.

At this point I ought not to omit a reply to an oft-repeated question, "How did Porter know Longstreet was there?" Well, if Pope had been in Porter's place he would not have known it until a dozen or more regiments had been sacrificed, and even then he would have wondered whether it was not somebody else. I will tell you how Porter knew it. Porter first received a message from a countryman, who came through the lines, that Longstreet's skirmishers were coming forward to that branch. He subsequently captured some prisoners, and upon examination he found they belonged to Longstreet's corps. He received a dispatch from Buford, handed him by McDowell, that Buford had seen seventeen regiments pass a point within 8 miles distant about an hour and a half or two hours before.

His skirmish line, under the command of an officer of the regular Army then commanding the Thirteenth New York, reported Longstreet in front; and General Porter knew Longstreet well enough to know that he did not go wandering around the country like Pope, but always went in state [laughter], supported by his whole retinue! When we struck Longstreet's forces, or Jackson's, or Lee's, we knew who was there. We knew we were fighting a battle with men who went to do battle in a condition to do battle; that we were not fighting stragglers.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me to read three lines?

Mr. BRAGG. No; you can read all you like when you go home to-night. [Laughter.]

But we are told certain brigades were thrown in support. If the distinguished gentleman from Vermont wants to find out the position of those brigades and how they were moved, he will find that the support of which he talks was so placed in the rear and opposite the center between Jackson and Longstreet that it served as a support for Longstreet, if he was pressed, and that if the enemy left his front it could be handled to support Jackson's right. The troops were changed and put in position, so the machine was ready to be handled to take the enemy if he came in front or the other way by reverse action and gobble him up. He will find that to be the condition of the troops if he will look at Longstreet's map, in which he lays down his own line with every brigade he had and the exact position of the supporting troops.

Now about the battle on the night of the 29th. On the 29th McDowell was there with the same insane mania Pope had, that the enemy heard those two gentlemen were there and was running away. [Laughter and applause]. That commenced in the afternoon of the 29th—that they were running away. About sundown of the 29th they ordered a portion of McDowell's division—he was not with it—Hatch had it—McDowell was not there—it would have taken a piece of artillery to fire a long way to reach where he was. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE rose.

Mr. BRAGG. Is my hour out?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. BRAGG. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Six minutes.

Mr. BRAGG. I have tormented my friends enough on the other side, and I now say in conclusion that I can not leave this debate without congratulating the country there are men who, acknowledging themselves to be Republicans in good standing, yet do not feel they are politically disgraced if they have the honesty to declare their sentiments by their votes. Would to God there was more freedom of conscience allowed in that party; we should have vastly more votes. [Applause.] As that party is to run on the Fitz-John Porter bill, it will not do for too many of you too come over, or the Black Eagle of the West may think he is losing some of his support. [Groans on the Republican side.] I am glad to hear you groan, for it is evidence there is a little bit of life left in you. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Groans always proceed from some suffering body. [Laughter and applause.] They are no evidence of a happy spirit, of a happy frame of mind, or of content, but of a cramp in the bowels, either mental or physical, and the record here proves it. [Laughter and applause.] I now demand the previous question. [Applause.]

Mr. BURROWS. I hope the court will preserve its dignity. [Cries of "Oh!" on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. STEELE. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRAGG. I hope the yeas and nays will be ordered.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to have permission to print Griffin's and Sykes's testimony. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG]—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan states that he rises to a question of personal privilege, and he is now stating it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] in the course of his remarks referred to the table printed by me in the RECORD of this morning with respect to the losses in the battle of Bull Run or Groveton, and charged me, as I understand him, with the purpose of misleading the readers of my remarks into believing the entire footing of the table showed the losses on the 29th of August, 1862. At that time I asked him to yield to me for a moment, which he declined to do.

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask now as a matter of personal privilege, and here now in this presence where the statement was made, to refer to that table in order to correct what I consider to be a misstatement in reference to my remarks. I ask it as a matter of personal privilege.

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan states he understood the gentleman from Wisconsin to attribute to him an improper purpose, that is, to mislead the readers of his remarks. If that is the correct understanding of the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin the Chair thinks a question of privilege is involved.

Mr. HAMMOND. No such remark was made.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The table in question is headed "Returns of casualties in the Union forces"——

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. Before the gentleman can have the right to raise the question of privilege as to a matter said about him on the floor the fact that such an expression was used must be ascertained. There was no remark made about his purpose at all, as I understand it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. And on that I call for the reading of the notes of the Official Reporter. The gentleman from Wisconsin referred to the table printed by me——

Mr. BRAGG. I did not refer to the table that was printed, for I did not know that it was printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Wisconsin did refer to some table which had been used in the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan. The Chair does not know whether this is the table or not.

Mr. BRAGG. I did not know that he had printed such a table. I referred to what I understood him to read on the floor. Of course I do not know what he has got printed. The last Congress shows many things said by the gentleman on the floor that were not printed.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Am I permitted to proceed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not yet decide whether the gentleman has stated a matter of personal privilege or not. The Chair understands the gentleman from Wisconsin to say that he does not know that he referred to the table to which the gentleman from Michigan now alludes.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The Official Reporter's notes will decide.

Mr. BRAGG. I did not know that you had printed a speech.

Mr. CUTCHEON. You referred to a table of casualties that I had used in my argument.

Mr. BRAGG I referred to a speech that you would print and that your constituents would read and which would be published in your country newspaper, and that it would pass for the history of this case; that is the substance and almost the language I used.

Mr. BRUMM. You stated that the gentleman had published a list of the losses during that whole campaign and fixed it all as of the 29th of August.

Mr. BRAGG. You have been showing your teeth here for the last few days, and the gentleman has nothing to do with this question.

Mr. BRUMM. You distinctly made that statement on the floor.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Am I permitted to proceed?

The SPEAKER. Before the Chair can decide whether a question of personal privilege is involved or not it will be necessary to know what the gentleman from Wisconsin actually said.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I demand the reading of the Reporter's notes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause it to be written out and have it read.

Mr. BRAGG. I have not been guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House. The taking of this vote can not be delayed in this way. If I have been guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House, and the words have been taken down, they will be considered at the proper time; but calling the previous question and taking the vote can not be delayed by a man rising here and asking that certain things shall be read.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. There is no such claim made.

The SPEAKER. There is no such claim made, and if it were made it would have been necessary to take the words down at the moment.

The gentleman from Michigan rises to a question of personal privilege, and says that the gentleman from Wisconsin, in his remarks, has questioned his motives; or, in other words, attributed improper motives in the use of the table in question. This is not a question affecting the dignity of the House itself or the integrity of its proceedings, but it is a question of personal privilege made by the gentleman from Michigan. Now, of course the Chair can not determine whether any question of personal privilege is involved unless he can ascertain exactly what was said.

Mr. CUTCHEON. And I have asked for the reading of the Reporter's notes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read what was said.

The Clerk read as follows:

Now, to show you that the animus of the partisan Republican has not yet died out, let me state that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] took the report of the battle of Bull Run and read from the official records the number of killed and wounded upon the 29th day of August for the purpose of showing that there was a general battle. If he had been disposed to be ingenuous he would have said that the headings of those official reports are the casualties between the 16th day of August and the 2d of September.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I have so stated. The entire number of casualties is 14,462.

Mr. BRAGG. I do not yield. It is the same old story. You took a table of figures from a heading that covered almost a month, including all the battles of the Rappahannock and Cedar Mountain, and from that table you have published in your speech the evidence of losses on the 29th day of August. And your Republican constituents, who read nothing but your speech in a Republican newspaper, will think that is historical evidence of the war.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The figures show precisely what they apply to.

Mr. BRAGG. I decline to be disturbed.

Mr. CUTCHEON. When you make such a statement as that I should be allowed to make a correction.

Mr. BRAGG. I state what you said. I state what the figures are. I draw my own inferences as to your purposes, and will repeat them if you desire it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I only claim you shall not cram a falsehood down the throat of this House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Michigan that the gentleman from Wisconsin is not subject to interruption except by his consent, and he has declined to yield.

Mr. BRAGG. I am delighted to have driven that Radical from under Stanton's petticoats, so that he has come out to the front.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I think that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG], in the portion of his remarks where he intimated that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] had been disingenuous, and afterward spoke of that gentleman's "purpose," did create a case which gave the gentleman from Michigan a right to rise to a question of privilege; and when the gentleman from Michigan is done with that, I think his own remark about the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] "cramming falsehood down the throat of the House" will justify the gentleman from Wisconsin in rising to a question of privilege.

Mr. REED, of Maine. All right. Let him rise.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to settle this matter by arbitration. I have not called upon anybody but the Speaker of this House to settle it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the remark made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] in reference to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] might, without any strained construction, be understood as attributing to the gentleman from Michigan a disposition not to be ingenuous in the discussion of this bill.

Mr. BRAGG. Let me say to the Speaker that there is a participle there which I did not use, because I did not know the heading was printed. [Cries of "Regular order!" on the Republican side.]

I will give you [addressing Mr. CUTCHEON] cause for personal explanation if you will let me speak a minute now. The gentleman from Michigan stated in his speech that Fitz-John Porter was lying down 2½ miles from the head of his column. There is no such evidence in the record. [Renewed cries of "Regular order!" on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. It is not in order at this time to discuss what the gentleman from Michigan or any other gentleman has said during the progress of the debate. The only matter now before the House is the question of privilege raised by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON], and that gentleman, the Chair thinks, has a right to make a statement as to what his tables show. That is the extent of the privilege. The merits of the bill are not now before the House for discussion.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Thanks. The table in question to which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] referred is headed as follows: "Return of casualties in the Union forces, commanded by Maj. Gen. John Pope, during the operations August 16–September 2, 1862, inclusive." I will not read the names of the different corps, but the aggregate is 14,462. That is followed by this statement, which was a part of my speech as delivered:

This includes all the fighting on the Rappahannock, the battles at Catlett's 25th, Kettle Run 26th and 27th, Manassas 26th and 27th, Bull Run Bridge 27th, Thoroughfare Gap and Gibbon's fight 28th, Groveton 29th, Bull Run 30th, and Chantilly September 1, and nearly one-half that entire loss was on the 29th, at Groveton.

I believe that it is demonstrable that one-half of this entire loss occurred upon the 29th.

Mr. BRAGG. That is the printed speech. It was not delivered in that form. [Renewed cries of "Regular order!" on the Republican side.]

The question was taken on the passage of the bill, and there were—yeas 171, nays 113, not voting 39; as follows:

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon, and they were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 1032) to refund duties upon goods on shipboard when the tariff act of March 3, 1883, went into effect;

A bill (S. 459) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to overrule and reverse the decisions of all inferior officers of the Treasury Department in respect to all matters of account;

A bill (S. 558) to refund internal-revenue taxes in certain cases; and

A bill (S. 956) for the relief of Thomas C. Killie.

Mr. MORRILL. I am also directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 395) to admit free of duty a certain set of altars for the Catholic church of St. John the Evangelist, in the parish of La Fayette, Louisiana, to report it adversely on the unanimous agreement that the Senate committee can not report a tariff bill, and on the agreement of several members of the committee that it would not be judicious to report it any way. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Thayer, deceased, surviving partner of Thayer Brothers, and others, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOAR. There is an enormous burden upon the Committee on Claims and a number of cases which have been referred to that committee the Senator himself has desired to have referred to the Committee on Finance. I think before making these new references the Senator should state to the Senate, so that the Committee on Claims themselves may know, what is the character of the claim, so as to see whether it comes within their jurisdiction.

Mr. MORRILL. I think the Senator will be satisfied that the bill ought to go to the Committee on Claims. Senate bill 559 is to pay a claim for leakage of distilled spirits as long ago as 1864. I presume the Senator will agree that the Committee on Claims has jurisdiction of that bill. Senate bill 449 is in relation to the Freedman's Savings Bank.

Mr. HOAR. Not long since the Committee on Claims reported a bill to repay to a person the amount of drawback where, by the dishonesty of his clerk, the fees had not been paid, although the clerk had been sent with the fees to the custom-house to make the entry, and the Senator thought that that bill ought to be considered by the Committee on Finance and objected to the consideration by the Senate of the report of the Committee on Claims. If a claim growing out of the collection of the revenues of the country or of the enforcement illegally or improperly of taxes belongs to the Committeee on Finance, I do not see why a claim to revise the matter of allowance for the leakage of whisky should not go there. Certainly the members of that committee, as far as we know them, are amply competent to deal with that general subject.

Mr. MORRILL. The bill to which the Senator refers will receive early attention. Upon the reading of it at the desk it struck me as being a bill that should be taken charge of by the Finance Committee.

Mr. HOAR. What is the distinction in principle between that bill and the one just sent back from the Committee on Finance for reference to the Committee on Claims?

Mr. MORRILL. A claim that is twenty years old ought to be investigated by the Committee on Claims undoubtedly.

Mr. HOAR. Then a claim growing out of the administration of the revenue laws which is fifteen years old belongs to the Committee on Finance, and one twenty years old belongs to the Committee on Claims. Is that the idea? I should like to have some principle stated by that committee.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall satisfy the Senator on that point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Finance will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and it will be referred to the Committee on Claims if there is no other motion made. That change of reference will be made.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1118) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to deliver to the rightful owners the contents of certain boxes deposited in the Treasury Department by the Secretary of War, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 950) to authorize suits to be brought in the Court of Claims for money paid and expenses incurred on account of Tice meters, to report it adversely and ask to have it placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 327) to enable national banking associations to increase their capital stock and to change their names or locations, to report it favorably. If the Senate will consent to hear the reading of this bill it will be seen that its passage will save us the trouble of passing on a great many individual bills. The inquiry is often made why we do not report a general bill on the subject, instead of reporting individual cases. I have two bills now that I shall report adversely if we can pass this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS (to Mr. MORRILL). We can not pass it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont ask for the consideration of the bill at this time?

Mr. MORRILL. My colleague objects to its consideration now, and I shall therefore let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 634) relating to sales for taxes in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1380) regulating the sale of distilled and fermented liquors in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1422) to amend the law relating to the bonds of executors in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1130) to exempt from taxation all property held by the trustees of the Corcoran Gallery of Art, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1129) to exempt from taxation all property held by the trustees of the Louise Home, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 984) to regulate the foreclosure of mortgages and deeds of trust in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 495) changing the name of the Real Estate Title Insurance Company of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 1598) to annex a certain strip of land therein named to the Territory of New Mexico; which was read twice by its title.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a bill (S. 1599) for the relief of the Phœnix National Bank, of the City of New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I introduce a bill by request. From explanations made to me I think the subject certainly deserves investigation and some species of remedy. It applies in substance to the hours letter-carriers in the large cities are obliged to do duty, which seem to be in excess of what human nature in some instances can endure. I hope, therefore, the bill will receive the careful investigation of the Committee on Education and Labor.

The bill (S. 1600) to amend section 3738 of the Revised Statutes relative to the eight-hour law was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas (by request), introduced a bill (S. 1601) to provide for the settlement of certain Cherokee claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CONGER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1602) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan at East Saginaw, in said district; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, introduced a bill (S. 1603) to protect certain purchasers of lands from the Northern Pacific Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1604) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers and sailors in the State of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 738) for the relief of James Clifford.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 67) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

REDEMPTION OF UNITED STATES NOTES.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to inform the Senate the aggregate amount of United States notes redeemed, as required by the resumption act, so called, for and during each fiscal year beginning July 1, 1879, and ending June 30, 1885, and also a like statement for the period beginning January 1, 1879, and ending June 30, 1879, and for the period beginning July 1, 1885, and ending December 31, 1885.

THE KILLING OF CAPTAIN CRAWFORD.

Mr. MANDERSON. I rise to offer a resolution, and after it shall have been read at the desk I shall ask that the Senate take action upon it. But before such action by the Senate I desire to submit a few remarks with reference to the subject-matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War be directed to inquire and report to the Senate the facts pertaining to the killing of Capt. Emmet Crawford, of the United States Army, said to have been slain on or about January 10, 1886, by the troops of the Republic of Mexico or by the troops of the states of Chihuahua and Sonora, in the Republic of Mexico; also to report what steps are being taken for the punishment by the Mexican Government of those guilty of the alleged outrage; whether reparation and indemnity should not be made to those who suffered, and ample and full explanation and apology should not be rendered for this apparently gross insult to our arms.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask the Senate to consider the resolution at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was going to remark to my friend from Nebraska that it has always been the course of the Senate in such cases about foreign affairs that might involve difficulty to send such resolutions to the Committee on Foreign Relations, who can confer informally with the President and Secretary of State and ascertain in what form the matter should be put, if it is necessary to put it at all. I hope, therefore, my friend will consent to the resolution being referred to that committee.

Mr. MANDERSON. I shall not object to that reference, but before the resolution is referred——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution being objected to, it goes over until to-morrow.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Nebraska ought to be allowed to make any remarks he desires before the reference is made.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly there is no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. MANDERSON. I believe it to be due to the relatives of this dead soldier, many of whom reside in the State in which I live, due to the Senate of the United States, and to the country, that some of the facts connected with this killing should be made public prior to any investigation by either the War Department, the Department of State, and perhaps before consideration by the Committee of the Senate on Foreign Relations.

I have before me a treaty made in 1882 between the United States and the Republic of Mexico. It was signed upon the 29th day of July, 1882. I will read a part of it, so that the matter may be fully understood:

Memorandum of an agreement entered into in behalf of their respective governments, by Frederick T. Frelinghuysen, Secretary of State of the United States of America, and Matias Romero, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Republic of Mexico, providing for the reciprocal crossing of the international boundary line by the troops of the respective governments in pursuit of savage Indians, under the conditions hereinafter stated.

ARTICLE I.

It is agreed that the regular federal troops of the two republics may reciprocally cross the boundary line of the two countries, when they are in close pursuit of a band of savage Indians, upon the conditions stated in the following articles:

ARTICLE II.

The reciprocal crossing agreed upon in Article I shall only occur in the unpopulated or desert parts of said boundary line. For the purposes of this agreement the unpopulated or desert parts are defined to be all those points which are at least two leagues distant from any encampment or town of either country.

I then pass to Articles VI and VII of the agreement and read as follows:

ARTICLE VI.

The abuses which may be committed by the forces which cross into the territory of the other nation shall be punished by the government to which the forces belong, according to the gravity of the offense and in conformity to its laws, as if the abuses had been committed in its own territory, the said government being further under obligation to withdraw the guilty parties from the frontier.

ARTICLE VII.

In the cases of offenses which may be committed by the inhabitants of the one country against the foreign forces which may be within its limits, the government of said country shall only be responsible to the government of the other for denial of justice in the punishment of the guilty.

This treaty, thus entered into in 1882, by repeated agreements of the two governments, has been continued year after year, and the last agreement, made in the year 1885, extended its provisions to November 1, 1886.

In accordance with the terms of the treaty between the two republics, Captain Crawford, in charge of about two hundred men and in pursuit of hostile Apache Indians, crossed into the State of Sonora some time in December, 1885. I understand that his troop was composed of about fifty white men and about one hundred and fifty Indian scouts, enlisted by our Government and wearing not the garb of Indians but the uniform of the United States Army.

These men early in January were in hot pursuit of the hostile Apaches. They reached a point near Nacori, in the State of Sonora. I have before me, and propose to read for the information of the Senate, a part of the report of Lieut. Marion P. Maus, who succeeded to the command of the troops after the killing of Captain Crawford, and I submit that this report shows a condition of affairs that reflects most severely upon whoever was in charge, or whoever directed the action of the Mexican forces by whom Captain Crawford's command was attacked. This is the official report of Lieutenant Maus, made to General Crook and dated the 21st day of January, 1886. He writes from camp near Nacori, Sonora:

I have the honor to report that this command, under Captain Crawford, Third Cavalry, after a march of eighteen hours, struck on Sunday, the 10th instant the hostile camp, about 50 miles southwest of Nacori and 1 mile north of the Ara River, or Rio Grande. The hostiles, evidently fearing an attack, had placed their camp among the rocks, a commanding position, where a few men could successfully resist a large force. The four companies of this post were so disposed as to nearly surround the hostile camp.

This preparation having been made, an attack was ordered upon the hostile camp of Indians. They were driven from it, and pursuit was made for several hours after they had fled from their camp. At nightfall our troops went into camp, and I take up the account of Lieutenant Maus at that point:

At daylight the next morning—Monday, the 10th instant—the camp was alarmed by loud cries from some of the scouts, followed immediately by a shower of bullets into our camp. I, with Lieutenant Shipp and Mr. Horn, ran forward to stop it, as it was supposed to be an attack by Captain Davis's scouts through mistake. It was soon discovered, however, that the attacking party was a large force of Mexican soldiers from Chihuahua, numbering, as I afterward ascertained from them, one hundred and fifty-four. They wore no uniform.

I supposed they were Nationals. Although we tried in every way, waving handkerchiefs and calling out in Spanish who we were, they continued a sharp fire for about fifteen minutes. It then seemed that we had made them understand that we were American soldiers and friends. A party of them approached, and Captain Crawford and I went out about 50 yards from our position in the open and talked with them. They did not stop moving. I told them in Spanish that we were American soldiers; called attention to our dress, and said we would not fire. They answered they would not fire, but all the time moved toward a hill a short distance away, a little higher than our position, with some scattering oak wood.

Captain Crawford then ordered me to go back and insure no more firing. I started back when again a volley was fired. Of course we all sought shelter. I am sure they knew who we were perfectly well at this time. Lieutenant Shipp and Mr. Horn were also shouting at another point, telling whom we were; that all was right. Mr. Horn speaks Spanish very well.

When I turned again I saw the captain lying on the rocks, with a wound in his head and some of his brains upon the rocks. This has all occurred in two minutes. He was said to be waving his handkerchief when shot. Mr. Horn was also wounded at the same time, in the left arm, slightly. It is remarkable no others were shot.

There can be no mistake; these men knew they were firing at American soldiers.

At this time I took command, and endeavored by all means to prevent more firing. I do not believe the scouts fired more than was necessary to keep the Mexicans away. After about half an hour longer firing ceased and an answer to our cries came from the Mexicans.

I sent Mr. Horn to go out and talk with one of them who advanced, and I soon followed him to a point some three hundred yards away. I had a talk with the man in command, their captain having been killed. I was told by many they were sure we were hostiles; that they took our trail for a hostile train, and, it being dark, they could not tell. They seemed very sincere in their regrets, and signed a paper stating it was all a mistake, &c. They asked me for horses to take their wounded away, and wanted rations. I promised to do what I could, and also promised, as they requested, to send the doctor to dress the wounded.

The result of this unfortunate affair was a loss to us of Captain Crawford, Third Cavalry, mortally wounded; Mr. Horn, chief of scouts, slightly wounded; two Indian scouts, slightly, and one severely.

The loss on the part of the Mexicans, so far as I could determine, was four killed and five wounded. I saw the bodies of four carried away from within one hundred yards of our camp. I examined each of them myself. I had to cause the men carrying them away to come without arms, as I feared the scouts would fire at them again, and I remained until they were carried off the field.

It seems hardly possible that these men should continue this attack when they knew who we were, but I now believe they expected to drive us off with an overwhelming force, and secure our camp and effects. I do not believe they had any idea we were so strong or had taken such a strong position, for which we were indebted to the hostiles, fearing a fresh conflict.

Afterward he goes on to say that it being demanded that he should furnish to the Mexican troops certain pack-trains, mules, &c., with which they could move their wounded, he went to see them, being assured that all was right, and proceeds:

I was assured that all was right, and finally went over a small hill a few yards farther, when I was surrounded by these men, a hard-looking crowd. They were armed with 44-caliber Remington rifles, carrying a cartridge much like our brass cartridges. Their manner was threatening; they made many demands, said I had no authority in Mexico, and asked me to produce my papers. I can not now explain all their questions. I had no papers to show them. Captain Crawford had left all behind with the train. They asked me for six mules to take their wounded. I did not expect to get away. But I told them that, on my word of honor, I would send them if they would let me go back. They refused to take the ponies, as they said they were worthless. The Indians were shouting and stripping at the time for a fight. I was then permitted to go.

He then went back to camp and sent the necessary aid.

I think it will be ascertained that there was another motive for this attack upon our arms of the soldiers of the states of Chihuahua and Sonora. The Mexican Government offered some years ago, and I believe the law is still operative, $400 for the scalp of every hostile Indian taken in the states of Sonora and Chihuahua or upon our southern border. I take it that the scalp of the enlisted Indian serving under the United States flag would probably bring as much money to the captors from the authorities of Sonora and Chihuahua as the scalp of any hostile Apache; and from private advices I have received from that section I believe this was one of the motives of these Mexicans, whether they were national soldiers or troops of the two states named, in committing this terrible outrage.

This matter should receive full investigation. It is due to the family of this deceased soldier, a man who stood as high as any other man in the Army of the United States. I knew him years ago when he served under General Crook in the brilliant campaign made by that gallant officer against the hostile Sioux in Northern Nebraska, and I do not wonder that his old commander speaks of him in warm terms of praise in the order lately issued by him having reference to his brave conduct and heroic death. He closes his tribute to the lamented Crawford by saying:

Brave as a lion, tender and gentle as a woman; always averse to alluding to his own achievements, temperate, noble, and wise—he was during life an honor to his profession, and by his death is an example to his comrades.

Mr. President, I hope this matter will be very fully investigated and that reparation will be forced if necessary from the Mexican Government, if it be a party to or countenanced this crime, to the family of Captain Crawford.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska move the reference of the resolution?

Mr. MANDERSON. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to remark that it is a subject which certainly ought to be carefully investigated, but I think we are bound to assume at this present moment that the President and Secretary of State are not slumbering over this subject, but are making careful investigations to bring the Mexican Government to punish whatever of wrong (as it appears there was a good deal) was done. I certainly shall hope so, and can not doubt that that is the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

MARGARET KENNEDY.
